The key letter is from the National Association of Owners of Railroad and Public Utility Securities. It is accompanied by another appeal from a San Francisco stock and bond house.

THE KEY LETTER

The association letter follows:

"DEAR SIR: It is highly important that investors in electric power and light, gas, and street-railway companies should cooperate to safeguard their interests against unsound public discussion and unwise legislation. To effect such cooperation the National Association of Owners of Railroad and Public Utility Securities has enlarged its scope and is soliciting your membership.

"Investors in railroad securities have been united for years through the association, and have effectually sustained their interests as security owners before legislators and administrative officials. With other public utilities now under sharp discussion, with a senatorial investigation in prospect, and with considerable agitation for public ownership under way, the time is at hand when holders of utility securities must unite in order that their views and interests may be brought to public attention.

"The National Association of Owners of Railroad and Public Utility Securities represents the interests of the investor in public discussion of the utilities and will carry forward a campaign designed to inform the public of the extent to which all citizens, whether security holders or not, are directly concerned in maintaining the welfare of public utilities and the soundness of the securities issued by them.

"It will be clear to you that our views and our aims will be short in their weight unless we are strongly united in enunciating them. We count on your cooperation. An indorsement membership blank is on the reverse of this sheet. Your prompt return of it in the attached addressed envelope will be sincerely appreciated. One dollar is the individual membership fee.

"Very truly yours,

"MILTON W. HARRISON, President."

CLIENTS URGED TO JOIN

The brokerage-house letter emphasizes the reason for the solicitation in the following language:

"To Our Clients:

"We inclose herewith copy of a communication from Milton W. Harrison, president of the National Association of Owners of Railroad and Public Utility Securities (Inc.). This association represents an enlarged scope of the National Association of Owners of Railroad Securities, an organization that has been in existence for many years.

"The association provides an adequate and greatly needed representation for the owners of public utility securities in the United States. You will realize that such an association, speaking for millions of security holders throughout the country, is in a strong position to protect its members against many assailments, including ill-advised legislation. It also brings to the attention of its members matters of importance which require their attention, thought, and action.

"The sponsorship of the association is assurance of its efficiency.

"We believe in the association's campaign to increase its membership. Each added member gives so much added power and influence to the association and so much more assistance in the protection that the association can give to its members. We indorse the purposes and management of the association and recommend that serious consideration be given by all public utility security holders to this association and accordingly to its campaign to increase its membership.

MILLIONS COULD BE RAISED

An idea of what great proportions this pot of gold could reach if even a bare majority of the power, gas, and street-railway company stockholders dropped in their dollar can be had when it is realized there are 190,248 stockholders in the California power companies alone. According to figures obtained from the State railroad commission these stockholders are divided as follows:

Great Western Power Co., 11,607; San Joaquin Light & Power Co., 14,180; Pacific Gas & Electric, 39,149; Southern California Edison, 115,419 Western States Gas & Electric, 3,031; California-Oregon Power, 2,731; San Diego Consolidated Gas & Electric, 3,502.

The distribution of the association letter, however, is doubtless nation-wide, and its appeal, if answered, could easily raise millions of dollars.

PEIRCE, FAIR & CO.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has supplemented the editorial from the St. Louis Star which I had read from the desk. Very little attention was paid to the reading of it on the floor, and so I feel justified in calling attention to the fact that it discloses that the public-utility associations in the United States, according to information that has come to the Federal Trade Commission, spent a million dollars last year for educational purposes. The sinister thing about the matter is that they are subsidizing lecturers and professors in the various colleges of the country to instill into the minds of the youth there assembled their peculiar views concerning public questions in which they are more or less directly interested. To what extent this educational campaign is responsible for any sentiment that may exist in the country at the present time against public ownership as a policy is a matter of speculation, and speculation only. But the people who provide these funds are careful and conservative business men; they have not made an investment of a million dollars without expecting substantial returns in the shape of the public sentiment which they expect to develop.

THE COPLEY PRESS (INC.)

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. John Callan O'Laughlin to Hon. William E. Humphrey, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, relating to some incidents that occurred here within the last day or two. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD in fairness to Mr. O'Laughlin, who is a journalist, it is true, but a journalist in the very highest sense and one who in a long career in journalism has won the respect, regard, admiration, and affection of all those who know him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

[Copy of letter sent to-day to Federal Trade Commission]

COPLEY PRESS (INC.), AURORA, ILL.,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1928.

Hon. WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY,
Chairman Federal Trade Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to call your attention to the remarks in the United States Senate of Senator NORRIS, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 4874 and 4875 of the issue of Friday, March 16, 1928, and pages 4954, 4955, and 4956 of the issue of Monday, March 19, 1928.

Mr. NORRIS, on page 4875 of the said RECORD, read a letter from an unnamed person, whom he described as "superintendent of the municipal waterworks at Springfield, Ill.," wherein slanderous statements are made relative to Mr. Ira C. Copley and his purchases of various newspapers and to alleged contemplated purchases by him. The letter concludes:

"How far this newspaper monopoly will go nobody knows; but it is, indeed, a menace, and an investigation which would show the actual financial support behind this venture would undoubtedly reveal a direct utility connection and would be a splendid and far-reaching contribution toward the protection of the public."

Mr. NORRIS concluded his remarks by referring the matter in respect of Mr. Copley to the Federal Trade Commission "for proper investigation."

On March 19 Mr. NORRIS sought to explain his reference to the Los Angeles Express, and quoted a letter to him from the undersigned demanding that the investigation as to Mr. Copley's acquisitions be pushed to the fullest extent and insisting that he present all the evidence or information in his possession which might directly or indirectly relate to such alleged connections (i. e., between Mr. Copley's newspaper acquisitions and the financing of public-utility corporations).

The additional "evidence" presented by Mr. NORRIS comprised a public advertisement dated March 7, 1928, for a bond issue for Copley Press (Inc.), attached hereto, which set forth the details of the offering and the purpose of employment of the proceeds thereof; and extracts from a copy of a newspaper published in Los Angeles, known as the Open Forum. That paper is published by the southern California branch of the American Civil Liberties Union and is extremely radical. It has openly expressed sympathy with anarchists, socialists, and the soviet government. Its editors are Upton Sinclair, whose record is well known, and other pronounced socialists. Undoubtedly Mr. NORRIS did not realize the character of the source of the emanations which he spread upon the records of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS repeated loose and false statements reflecting upon the honor and integrity of Mr. Copley and his purpose in acquiring papers in addition to those he has owned for many years.

In view of these statements and the objectionable and unfounded insinuations made, Copley Press (Inc.) respectfully requests the Federal Trade Commission to give immediate consideration to the subject matter of the remarks of the said Senator NORRIS. The commission unquestionably will realize, as do all fair-minded men, that slander to be crushed must be dealt with instantly; and it is in the firm conviction that this is the attitude of the commission that Copley Press (Inc.) urges disposition of the matter at once.

Copley Press (Inc.) will be glad, if the commission so pleases, to furnish all its records and correspondence, files of the papers since Mr. Copley purchased them, to produce witnesses, and, in short, to give the utmost cooperation to any inquiry it deems it desirable to make.

Very respectfully,

JOHN CALLAN O'LAUGHLIN,
Vice President Copley Press (Inc.).

RECREATION PIER, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1665) to authorize the board of park commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco to construct a recreation pier at the foot of Van Ness Avenue, San Francisco, Calif., which was, on page 2, line 5, after the word "Service," to insert "and prior to use of said recreation pier by the city of San Francisco."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ENFORCEMENT OF NARCOTIC DRUGS ACTS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 10083) to provide for advances of funds by special disbursing agents in connection with the enforcement of acts relating to narcotic drugs, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to have the Chair hold the bill at the desk. I think a similar Senate bill has been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Utah and for the information of the Senate that yesterday the Senate passed an identical bill prior to the reception of this bill from the House.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think I can satisfy the Senator in a moment if he will permit me. I was about to state that the House had passed a companion bill with certain amendments. I have made inquiry and I find that those amendments are entirely satisfactory to the department. Therefore I move that the Senate reconsider the votes whereby we ordered to a third reading and passed the bill (S. 3311) to provide for advances of funds by special disbursing agents in connection with the enforcement of acts relating to narcotic drugs.

Mr. JONES. Is the bill here or has it gone to the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not been messaged to the House. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask now that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I now ask for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 10083) to provide for advances of funds by special disbursing agents in connection with the enforcing of acts relating to narcotic drugs.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Prohibition, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to direct the advance of funds by special disbursing agents in connection with the enforcement of the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon, all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or cocoa leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes," approved December 17, 1914, as amended by the revenue act of 1918, and the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes,' approved February 9, 1909," as amended by the act of May 26, 1922, known as "the narcotic drugs import and export act."

Such advances in connection with the enforcement of the acts hereinabove stated relating to narcotic drugs may be made, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (sec. 529, title 31, U. S. Code), from the appropriations available for the enforcement of such acts and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1271) to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds, and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes.

Mr. DILL. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the pending bill, and I should like to have it read and printed so that it may be available in printed form to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The clerk will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, after line 11, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. That $1,000,000 of the $1,500,000 authorized to be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States for the purchase of refuges for wild life and fish as provided in section 10 of an act to establish the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge, approved June 7, 1924, is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States for the purchase or rental by the commission at the price or prices fixed by the commission for migratory-bird reservations as provided in this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The question is on the committee amendment on page 5, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 10, on page 5, line 18, after the word "or," it is proposed to insert "occupy or use any part thereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That no person shall take any bird, or nest, or egg thereof, or knowingly disturb, injure, or destroy any notice, signboard, fence, building, ditch, dam, dike, embankment, flume, spillway, or other improvement or property of the United States on any area acquired under this act, or cut, burn, or destroy any timber, grass, or other natural growth, on said area or on any area of the United States which heretofore has been or which hereafter may be set apart or reserved for the use of the Department of Agriculture as a game refuge or as a preserve or reservation and breeding ground for native birds, under any law, proclamation, or Executive order, or occupy or use any part thereof, or enter thereon for any purpose, except in accordance with regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture; but nothing in this act or in any regulation thereunder shall be construed to prevent a person from entering upon any area acquired under this act for the purpose of fishing in accordance with the law of the State in which such area is located: Provided, That such person complies with the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture covering such area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, just a second. I had the floor last night when the Senate recessed, and I do not want the RECORD to show that any amendment has been agreed to at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be considered as being open.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I had the floor last night, and I yielded this morning in order to permit the interesting discussion which has taken place. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	McMaster	Shortridge
Barkley	Fess	McNary	Simmons
Bayard	Fletcher	Mayfield	Smith
Bingham	Frazier	Metcalf	Smoot
Black	George	Moses	Steiwer
Blaine	Gerry	Neely	Stephens

Bratton	Hale	Nye	Tydings
Brookhart	Harris	Overman	Tyson
Broussard	Harrison	Phipps	Wagner
Bruce	Hawes	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Hayden	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.

Curtis	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.	Wheeler
Cutting	Keyes	Sackett	Willis
Deneen	King	Schall
Dill	La Follette	Sheppard
Edge	McKellar	Shipstead

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, on account of an engagement I am unable to proceed at this time, and I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. I ask, however, the privilege, when my remarks are made, of having them printed in the RECORD as though continuously made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BLAINE addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time——

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT SEVILLE, SPAIN

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to call up the joint resolution this morning reported by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] by the unanimous consent of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is extremely important that it should be passed to-day if possible. It is House Joint Resolution 211. The joint resolution merely relates to the manner of expenditure of the appropriation already made for the construction of an American building at the international exposition at Seville.

Mr. NORBECK. Reserving the right to object, I will agree to its consideration if it does not lead to extended debate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It will not lead to any debate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator state briefly what change is proposed by the joint resolution?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Two years ago Congress passed a law authorizing the appropriation of about $700,000 for the construction of an American building at Seville, Spain. It has been held by the Comptroller General that the expenditure of that money for architects' fees, for example, is illegal unless the architect is present to certify to every item of expenditure in the construction of the building. The architect's fee will amount to about $12,000. The architect who has been selected has been working on the building for about a year, and the period of construction will be 9 or 10 months more. Obviously, no architect of any practice or any reputation can afford to go to Spain and remain there superintending the construction of one small building for 9 or 10 months, yet the Comptroller General says he can not pay the architect or any contractor without this certificate.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator where is the exposition to be held?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is the international exposition which will be held in Seville next year or the following year.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the total appropriation?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The total appropriation made two years ago was $700,000. It is an important exposition in which the United States and other nations are taking part.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the joint resolution does what?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It permits the expenditure of money for the construction and the payment of architects' fees without requiring the Comptroller General to see that the architect is personally in attendance every minute.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations is unanimous.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 211) to amend Public Resolution 65, approved March 3, 1925, authorizing the participation of the United States in the international exposition to be held in Seville, Spain, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That appropriations heretofore made or hereafter to be made under the authorization of Public Resolution No. 65, approved March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. 1256), to enable the Government of the United States to participate in an international exposition at Seville, Spain, may be expended on the certificate of the Secretary of State that the employment of personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere and that the materials or services are necessary to enable the Government of the United States to participate in said exposition for the purposes enumerated in that resolution without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, or of any other act regulating or limiting the expenditure of public moneys: Provided, That this authority shall not be construed to waive the submission of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office for audit.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 445) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a cooperative agreement or agreements with the State of Montana and private owners of lands within the State of Montana for grazing and range development, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2317) continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8725) to amend section 224 of the Judicial Code, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. DYER, and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1271) to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory-bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds, and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAINE resumed his speech. After having spoken, with interruptions, for nearly three hours, he said:

Mr. President, I see the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] on his feet. I am going to yield to him with the understanding that upon the convening of the Senate to-morrow I will undertake to conclude this debate so far as I am concerned. I understand that the Senator desires to move an executive session.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that we shall probably adjourn to-night, and the pending bill is not likely to come before the Senate until 2 o'clock.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Wisconsin would have the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator would have the floor then.

Mr. BLAINE. A parliamentary inquiry. I will have the floor, then, at the close of the morning business, if closed by 2 o'clock, or whenever it is closed?

Mr. CURTIS. So I understand.

Mr. SWANSON. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to move an executive session.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator.

[Mr. BLAINE's speech will be published entire in the RECORD of March 26.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have here a document that it will take too much time to read if we are to have an executive session. Therefore, I shall ask that it be read to-morrow.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT OR NEAR PLATTSMOUTH, NEBR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). If the Senator from Kansas will withhold his motion for a moment the Chair, on behalf of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], asks permission to report favorably, from the Committee on Commerce, House bill 10373, and to submit a report (No. 600) thereon.

On behalf of the Senator from Vermont, the Chair asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10373) authorizing the Plattsmouth Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Plattsmouth, Nebr.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 22, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

INTERNATIONAL RADIOTELEGRAPH CONVENTION

In executive session this day, the Senate, having had under consideration Executive B, Seventieth Congress, first session, an International Radiotelegraph Convention, and general and supplementary regulations relating thereto, signed at Washington, D. C., on November 25, 1927, advised and consented to its ratification, subject to the following understandings and conditions:

First. The words "de 160 à 194 kc/s" in the first sentence of paragraph 6 of article 19 of the general regulations, which were used through error, shall be corrected by substituting therefor the words "de 100 à 160 kc/s."

Second. The amendments adopted by the delegates in the closing session of the conference on November 25, 1927, as stated in the minutes of that meeting, including the consecutive numbering of the articles and paragraphs by the International Bureau of the Telegraph Union, shall be incorporated into this convention and the general regulations prior to ratification thereof.

(The injunction of secrecy was removed from this convention on December 17, 1927, on motion of Mr. BORAH and by unanimous consent.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, March 21, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Clerk, Hon. William Tyler Page.

The CLERK. The Clerk will read the following communication from the Speaker:

MARCH 21, 1928.

I hereby designate Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL to act as Speaker pro tempore to-day.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] will please take the chair.

Mr. SNELL assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, Thou art love, and love resists definition. The undefinable God reveals Himself in a way which defies analysis. The sweetest passions of the human heart, multiplied by infinity, such is our blessed Heavenly Father. Hear us as we call. It is a solemn thing for us to enter this historic Chamber as servants of this wonderful Republic. Amid the stress and crash of change, unaffected by the losses of the past or the hopes of the future, here mighty men have raised their voices in fervent appeal; Thou wert with them. We thank Thee that the years make no change in Thy attitude; Thou art patient because Thou art eternal. As Thy hand was on the past it will be on the present. Our country, stored and armed with education, wealth, and opportunity, do Thou fortify us with courage and wisdom and with all their noble strength, so that it shall never be proclaimed that we are false to our great trust or untrue to our great obligation. O let it never be said that the wisdom of to-day will be the error of to-morrow. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I was not; but if I had been present I would have voted "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected was laid on the table.

KAIBAB INDIAN RESERVATION

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I present House Joint Resolution 245, to make immediately available the appropriation for a road across the Kaibab Indian Reservation, with the report of the Committee on Appropriations thereon, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will say that all the resolution does is to make the money immediately available.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation of $10,000 for the improvement and maintenance of the road across the Kaibab Indian Reservation, northern Arizona, en route to Grand Canyon National Park, as contained in the Interior Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1929, approved March 7, 1928, shall be available for expenditure upon the approval of this resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

THE JUDICIAL CODE

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 8725, a bill to amend section 224 of the Judicial Code, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 8725, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendments: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$6,000" and insert "$5,000."

Page 2, line 2, strike out all after "court" down to and including "grade," in line 4.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the reason why the Senate amendments should not be incorporated in the bill?

Mr. DYER. There are two amendments; both of them are of importance, and the second one is of considerable importance. The chairman of the committee feels we should have a conference upon the amendments as requested by the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why does not the gentleman from Missouri make the preferential motion "to agree to the Senate amendments" and settle the matter?

Mr. DYER. We are not in favor of the Senate amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is not in favor of the economy that is proposed in the first amendment, whereby we would save $1,000 on salaries per annum?

Mr. DYER. It is the second amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman is not going to insist on the first amendment going out in conference, is he?

Mr. DYER. Well, I will be only one of the conferees, I will say to the gentleman, and I can not speak for the other conferees.

Mr. BLANTON. Your whole fight is not on the first amendment but on the second one.

Mr. DYER. It is more on that one, as far as I personally am concerned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Messrs. GRAHAM, DYER, and SUMNERS of Texas.

GRAZING AND RANGE DEVELOPMENT

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 445, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a cooperative agreement or agreements with the State of Montana and private owners of land within the State of Montana for grazing and range development, and for other purposes, and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 445, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. 1181, a bill authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 1181, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may we have the House amendment reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all after "270)," in line 3, down to and including the word "expended" in line 11, and insert "available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $2,000,000; in all for this period, $4,000,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to insist on the House amendment and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed the following conferees: Messrs. HAUGEN, PURNELL, and ASWELL.

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2317) continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 2317) entitled "An act continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by the House, and in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House insert the following:

"SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 9 of the radio act of 1927 is amended to read as follows:

"'It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor; and shall make a fair and equitable allocation of licenses, wave lengths, time for operation, and station power to each of the States, the District of Columbia, the Territories, and possessions of the United States within each zone, according to population. The licensing authority shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, whenever necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, when applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses: Provided, That, if and when there is a lack of applications from any zone for the proportionate share of licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, or station power to which such zone is entitled, the licensing authority may issue licenses for the balance of the proportion not applied for from any zone to applicants from other zones for a temporary period of 90 days each, and shall specifically designate that said apportionment is only for said temporary period. Allocations shall be charged to the State, District, Territory, or possession wherein the studio of the station is located and not where the transmitter is located.'"

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill S. 2317 submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On No. 1: As the bill passed the Senate it provided that no license for a broadcasting station issued prior to January 1, 1930, should be for a longer period than six months. The House amendment reduced this period of time to three months. The conferees have agreed upon three months.

On No. 2: The Senate bill provided that no license for any other class of station issued prior to January 1, 1930, should be for a period to exceed one year. The House amendment reduced this period of time to six months. The conferees have agreed upon the one year limitation as carried in the Senate bill.

On No. 3: In section 4 of the Senate bill it was provided that the term of office of each member of the commission should expire on February 23, 1929, and that thereafter the commissioners should be appointed for terms of 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 years. The House struck out this section of the Senate bill. The conferees have agreed to restore the same.

The House added a provision to the Senate bill amending the second paragraph of section 9 of the radio act of 1927. The House provision required the licensing authority to make an equal allocation to each of the five zones established by law of broadcasting licenses, of wave lengths, and of station power and within each zone required that there should be a fair and equitable allocation among the States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories and possessions therein in proportion to population.

The conferees have agreed upon an amendment to this House proposal. This amendment declares that the people of the zones are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service both of transmission and of reception and that in order to provide this equality the licensing authority shall, as nearly as possible, make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor. It includes substantially the provisions of the House amendment with respect to the equitable allocation within the zones. It further carries a direction to the licensing authority as to the means for bringing about this equality of broadcasting service. It carries an express provision that if and when there is a lack of applications from any zone for that zone's proportionate part of the licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, or power to which it is entitled that the licensing authority may issue licenses for that part of the proportion not applied for from any zone to applicants from other zones for temporary periods of time. A further provision of the conference agreement is that the allocation shall be charged to the State where the studio of the station is located and not where the transmitter is located.

WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr.,
FREDERICK R. LEHLBACH,
A. M. FREE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the statement just read I think clearly states the effect of the conference agreement. Perhaps, however, it is appropriate for me to go once more over the ground in somewhat greater detail.

There were three amendments in controversy between the two Houses.

The Senate bill provided that broadcasting licenses should be limited to a period of six months. The House reduced this period of time to three months and the Senate conferees have yielded to the House on this point. So that if, and when, adopted the conference report carries the provision that broadcasting licenses issued during this year shall be for three months of time only.

The Senate bill had another provision providing that for all other kinds of licenses the limit of time should be one year. The House reduced this period of time to six months, but yielded to the Senate conferees and restored the one-year period of time. The compelling reason which moved us to this recession was the fact that it seemed unnecessary that a great number of amateur licenses—some 16,000 or more—and the great number of ship licenses which are issued to the extent of perhaps 2,100 or so—it seemed an unnecessary administrative burden that these licenses should have to be renewed each six months. So we agreed that with respect to all other than broadcasting licenses the period of time shall be one year.

The next provision which was in controversy between the two Houses was the limitation upon the tenure of office of the commissioners. The Senate bill provided that the present commissioners should have a term of one year and that thereafter the term should be two years, three years, four years, and so forth, as fixed in the original law. The House yielded to the Senate on this.

The next matter of controversy, the major difference, the matter in which the membership of the House, I think, was primarily interested was with respect to the Davis amendment, so called.

You gentlemen have clearly in mind that this amendment provided for an equal allocation of licenses, of power, and of wave lengths among the zones set up by the law, and that within each zone there should be an equal distribution among the States in proportion to population. It seemed to the speaker there was one obvious defect in the Davis amendment, and there was also a doubt in the minds of many people with respect to it.

Let me first allude to what I conceive to be the defect which the conference committee has cured. The Davis amendment provided that the licensing authority should make an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of wave lengths, and of station power. There was, however, nothing in the amendment as it passed the House relating to the time for which stations should be licensed for operation. If you regarded only the language of the amendment itself, the licensing authority might have made its allocation of licenses, of power, of wave lengths, and then completely wrecked the equality which it was sought to achieve by making a grossly unfair allocation of time for operation.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Time for communication.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Time for communication; yes. Specifically, under that language the licensing authority might have granted to the third zone, using that for purposes of illustration, an equal number of licenses, equality of power, equality of wave lengths, and then provided that this should all be used not in the desirable times for broadcasting, but, say, between 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning. In other words, every advantage secured to the third zone or intended to be secured to the different sections of the country by the language of the amendment, might have been completely lost by this failure to include in the amendment an equal division of time as well as the other factors.

So the House and Senate conferees inserted a provision that there should be also an equal allocation of time.

The next difficulty arose with respect to the time when this equal allocation should be brought about and as to the method for bringing it about.

It was charged frequently, and it was asserted by a member of the Radio Commission, that as this language stood in the House amendment it required that instanter there should be brought about this equality, and it was insisted further that because there was a want of applications from a particular zone that of necessity if there was to be this equality, all zones and all sections of the country must be arbitrarily brought down to the level of the lowest. This was the assertion made, and it raised in the minds of many persons a serious doubt as to the wisdom of the amendment. The conferees of the two Houses have sought to cure this difficulty by the amendment which we have reported.

We have provided for equal allocation for licenses, wave length, power, and time when and in so far as applications shall be made therefor.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman from Maine will agree, will he not, that under the amendment as it passed the House it would not be necessary to reduce all the zones to the least zone?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That was the contention.

Mr. DAVIS. It was not a sound contention.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In my opinion, it was an untenable contention. In further answer to the gentleman, the report which I made gives my interpretation of the proper effect of the Davis amendment, so-called. I might as well read now what I said in that report as to the proper construction of the Davis amendment as it passed the House.

I said in this report that the amendment was intended to require the licensing authority, as soon as may be and in proper cases, to issue licenses in number and in kind to applicants from the third zone and other sections of the country sufficient to bring equality in the particulars specified.

Later on I said it is not anticipated that this purpose should be immediately accomplished.

Now, in my opinion the inclusion of that language "when and in so far as applications are made therefor" harmonizes the present conference draft with the purpose and intent of the Davis amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Of course it is possible that some question may arise in litigation in reference to the proper construction of the amendment now proposed. The gentleman is chairman of the conference committee on the part of the House. The Supreme Court, as he knows, has said that when there is a question of interpretation of an ambiguous or doubtful provision, it is competent for the court to look at committee reports. The court has also said in one case—and perhaps in others—but in one case that I have in mind, of Binn v. The United States (194 U. S.), that answers by chairmen to inquiries propounded on the floor can be looked at by the court in reaching a conclusion. As this is a matter of importance, I am going to take the liberty of making two inquiries of my friend and, with a view to precision, they are in writing. Here is one:

The conferees have reported several amendments to the equalization amendment as it passed the House. Do you consider that the original amendment is substantially changed by the alterations?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. My answer is, I do not. I think this draft agreed on by the conferees is in harmony with the original amendment. Does that answer your question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes. I would like to make a further inquiry. If the conference amendments do not result in any change in the interpretation and effect of the original provision, what was the purpose in adopting these amendments in conference? Having in mind the amendment attached to the zone equalization clause, to wit, "When and in so far as there are applications therefor," I wish to ask you whether or not in your opinion the licensing authority has full authority under the provisions as reported by the conferees to reduce the station power, change the wave length or period of time for operation of any existing station, even though such station applies for its present power, wave length, and time for operation? In other words, is your interpretation of the provision as reported by the conferees to the effect that the Federal Radio Commission or other licensing authority has full and unrestricted authority to make an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, or periods of time for operation, and of station power to each of the zones by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing or reassigning wave lengths, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, notwithstanding the words "when and in so far as there are applications therefor"?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I will answer the gentleman's last question first. I will answer that I do. I believe that the powers and the obligations of the commission in these regards are not limited by this language when it says "so far as there are applications therefor." Under the language in the conference draft the commission may do the specific things which I understand the gentleman's inquiry is directed to. I say, I do not believe that the language "when and in so far as applications therefor" in any respect diminishes or takes away the plenary authority of the commission in the particulars referred to.

Now, I will answer what I understand to be the gentleman's first question. The gentleman asks me, if that language effects no change, why was it put in? I do not suppose I am privileged to retell what took place in conference, but I will say this: That when I was asked out of the conference if that was what the Davis's amendment meant, why I objected to putting the amendment in, I did not have any answer. I agreed to the insertion of the language because I conceived that to be precisely what the Davis amendment meant, and I had no objection to the inclusion of the words themselves. [Applause.]

There is nothing new about that language. If gentlemen will go back to the original bill which passed the House, they will find that the language was—and I do not know that I can give it exactly, but in substance—that applications should be granted when and in so far as there was a demand for the same. The Senate had substantially the same language; that applications should be granted when and in so far as there was a demand for the same, and as the law was written and as it now is on the statute books, it is provided that in making the distribution contemplated by the law applications should be acted upon, in and so far as there was a demand for licenses and renewals of licenses. I think in the whole history of the legislation there is an assumption that the commission acts upon applications pending before it, and that was one of the reasons why we shortened the terms of these licenses to three months, so that constantly, at short intervals of time, there should come up before the commission these questions as to whether this or that particular license should be granted, whether this or that power should be allocated, whether this or that wave length should be assigned, or this distribution of time made. And as these applications come up there is the opportunity and there is the duty for the commission to act. Does that respond to the gentleman's question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In order to carry out the purpose of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] to have the RECORD clearly show the intent of Congress, while there can be no doubt as to the powers given by this act to the commission itself, the clear intent of the act is, is it not, that individuals or companies now operating under a temporary license or hereafter obtaining a temporary license to operate in the zone having its full allotment, are now operating with knowledge of that condition that the power and the time may be reduced in order to grant the power and time and wave length to another zone, in keeping with the provisions of the act.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I agree with the gentleman entirely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So that there can be no acquired right or vested interest predicated on a temporary license, and that in accepting a temporary license they are estopped, are they not, from claiming an acquired right or vested interest?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The law so specifically provides, and whenever a license expires the holder thereof must come in and de novo meet all of the terms and conditions of the act, and as these expirations come and as new applications are made, that expressly places upon the licensing authority the duty and the obligation to work out this equality. This language contemplates a gradual and an orderly bringing about of this result of equality, and it negatives the thought, which was in the minds of some people and which disturbed some people, that there should be immediate and arbitrary action in the absence of applications.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to inquire of the gentleman as to the allocation of power in respect to broadcasting within the several zones themselves, as to whether there shall be an equality of distribution within the zones.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is not the provision. The provision within the zones is that there shall be an equitable distribution, according to population, and that permits within the zone the exercise of some measure of discretion and judgment.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I notice that two of the conferees have not signed this report, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND]. Do I understand the gentleman's construction of this amendment to be in substance the Davis amendment?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Absolutely.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And the intent of Congress is that it is the duty of the commission to immediately proceed to divide this between the several zones equally? Is that the intent?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As and when applications are presented to the commission.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And there can be no question about the intent on the part of those who did sign the conference report, that that is what the meaning of the act is?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I should not personally have signed it unless I believed that to be the fact.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Original applications and also renewals?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Unquestionably.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand this matter may probably go to the courts. Do I understand the gentleman's view to be that the court in construing the intent of Congress takes into consideration oftentimes the debates on the passage of legislation?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] stated the rule.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Where there is ambiguity or doubt the court goes as far as I said a while ago. The court will by no means go to the extent of considering the full debate.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do not want to take further time. I have stated as clearly as I can the purpose of this portion of the conference report. The real distinction and the only distinction, except for this matter of time which was omitted from the Davis amendment and which has been inserted by the conferees and which I think is important, is that we recognize that there should be a gradual and orderly consummation of this idea and this ideal, and we have undertaken to disabuse the minds of the public of the idea that there is to be an immediate, arbitrary, and destructive bringing about of this result.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The trouble with us on this side of the House, and particularly those of us on the committee, is this: This amendment that the House so emphatically passed was the creature of the brain of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. The House instructed the conferees to undertake to incorporate that into law. We now have this situation, and that is the reason I want the gentleman to get the record clear, that neither of the minority members of the conference committee signed the conference report. That is the thing that is bothering us on this side of the House.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I can not presume to speak for the minority members. I have stated as clearly and as emphatically as I can my own reasons for the changes that were made in the language—my construction of the language—and I believe I have stated it correctly.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Do I understand it to be the gentleman's purpose to intend to say now, in effect, that this is carrying out the Davis amendment, and that is the idea that the gentleman intends to carry on now and hereafter?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Absolutely.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In the original act or any amendment thereto the gentleman is not aware of any language that would justify the conclusion that the license created a vested or preferential right?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the language of the law negatives that construction.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I wanted to get the gentleman's opinion on the effect this amendment would have on a broadcasting station located in a zone that has not now its proportion of power and wave lengths. For instance, there is a station in my district that has not now its proportion of power and wave lengths, and its proportion has been cut down gradually ever since it was constructed. Now, if the conferees' report is adopted and it becomes a law, how will that station be benefited by it? It is a zone which has not its proportion of power and wave lengths and still it is being cut down.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think under this language it is the clear and plain duty of the commission, when applications come in from zones which are not enjoying the equality at which we aim—it is the plain and manifest duty of the commission that if the applications in other respects conform to the law, that licenses will be granted that will bring about that equality of condition.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is there any difference between applications that are already in and those yet to be made?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. None whatever.

Mr. SANDLIN. A station that is receiving a sufficient amount of power and wave lengths—is it having its application for license taken up?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Every station which now has a license and wants to continue must at the end of the license period come in and make an application for a new license de novo, and this conference report says in express terms that the commission may reduce the power and change the wave lengths and the time of operation, and do all of those things that are necessary to bring about this equality.

Mr. SANDLIN. That applies to an application for a renewal, does it not?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; to a renewal as well as an original application.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman has been interrogated as to the meaning of the resolution here, which amends the Davis amendment.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. The question is about guiding the courts in a case of ambiguity. That is the purpose in any of the answers that the gentleman made. Was it meant to restrict in any way the plain language of the conference report?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman direct my attention to the particular language?

Mr. NEWTON. Here is a provision which says, "It is hereby declared," and so forth, and that language follows there, and it changes the Davis amendment, the text of the Davis amendment. The gentleman has gone on to state the purpose as being in substance the same as the Davis amendment. I am asking the gentleman whether, in answering those interrogatories, his intention was to restrict the plain purport of the report which the House is considering?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The Davis amendment refers especially to zones when it says there shall be an equality in the allocation of these different factors. The language of the report says that the people of the zones are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and reception, and then it says that in order to bring about this equality there shall be this equal allocation.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. As to the real change made by the committee in putting in this word "reception," it reads that we are entitled to an equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and reception, and to bring about that condition they should, as far as possible, have an equal allocation of wave lengths, station power, and frequency.

The commission are instructed to have in mind the fact that there shall be a fair distribution not only of transmission but also reception; and that is what I see they had in mind in writing this language, that there should be a fair distribution of reception. The Davis amendment contemplated equal allocation. We who have hitherto opposed the Davis amendment are fully satisfied with this.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It had been urged that broadcasting service meant simply reception. Now, in order to bring about complete clarity in respect to that, and in order to make certain that the purpose of the Davis amendment was effectuated, we wrote in that this equality should consist both of transmission and of reception.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as has been suggested, one of the other conferees and I declined to sign this conference report. I want to explain why we did so. In the first place, I want to state that I indorsed and agreed to all of the matters agreed to by the conferees except one amendment to the "equalization amendment" as it passed the House. I had no objection even to the other amendments to the "equalization amendment," except the one amendment which is added at the end of the equalization clause as it passed the House, in these words:

In so far as there are applications therefor.

I want to state that I know the gentleman from Maine is entirely sincere in his interpretation of the equalization clause as reported by the conferees. I want to say further that I think his interpretation is a fair and natural interpretation, and if I were called upon as a member of the commission or as a court to interpret that language I would interpret it just as the gentleman from Maine interprets it and just as I would have interpreted the "equalization amendment" as it passed the House. However, my reason for declining to sign the conference report and my objection to the language to which I referred is that it might be seized upon by somebody as a pretext for a different interpretation.

It is known that at least some members of the Federal Radio Commission are not only not in sympathy with this amendment and its purpose but are decidedly hostile to same. When we consider that they not only ignored but violated the provisions of the equitable-distribution clause in the present law, we may assume that they will probably undertake to distort or misinterpret the provision under consideration. We should not afford them the slightest opportunity to pursue such a course in the future. For instance, suppose that they should take the position, even though unreasonable, that the direction that "the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor" did not authorize them to change the wave length or reduce the period of time for operation or station power of a station, unless and until such station should apply for such change or reduction.

Of course, such an interpretation would not be in accord with the clear intent of the Members of the House.

It would be very destructive of the whole purpose of the original amendment and subversive of the clear intent of the large number in the House who voted for the original amendment, if that language might be so construed as to mean that it restricts the commission from reducing the power of any existing stations, changing the wave lengths of any existing stations, or anything of that kind, in the absence of applications therefor; that is, for a reduction or for a change of wave lengths.

The present broadcasting structure has simply grown up. It is a patchwork. It started in a small way, and as applications would come in they were granted a license and given some power and some wave lengths, frequently without due consideration for the existing situation. So the present structure, as everybody familiar with the situation knows, is not only unequal and inequitable, but it is unscientific.

I want to say, and anybody else who has studied the situation is bound to agree with the statement, that there can not be an equal or fair allocation of broadcasting privileges unless there is a general reassignment, a reallocation. I am just as much interested in a scientific set-up as I am in equal allocation. I want to improve the broadcasting situation.

I shall not undertake to go into technical details in explaining what I mean further than to give you one instance: On many wave lengths there have been placed a large number of stations, with various and different amounts of station power. They are in many instances placed close together, with the result that the assignment is unsatisfactory to all of them. That exists everywhere. There is such a situation that the only way the commission can ever work it out fairly, scientifically, and satisfactorily is to look at the whole picture and allocate and reassign and make such changes as are necessary to bring that about, and in order to do that they ought to have absolutely unrestricted power to do so. Now, as I say, I think that under a fair interpretation of the whole language they undoubtedly have that power, that they can do it, and that they are directed to do it, but my objection is this: After the House, by an enormous majority, had adopted a provision which is clear and unmistakable in its terms, one that can not be misconstrued or misunderstood, we then go into conference and add a lot of other language and make the provision four or five times as long as it was, and inject language which was unnecessary and language which, if it serves any purpose, can only be to give somebody a pretext upon which to hang some misconstruction of the provision or misinterpretation of the purpose of Congress.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. For a question, yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I was wondering if the words to which the gentleman objects that are in the proposed amendment were eliminated "in so far as there are applications therefor," it could not be reasonably assumed that the commission would have to cut down all of the zones in so far as allocations are concerned, actually to the minimum of the lowest zone. It seems to some of us who voted for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee that this conference amendment really clarifies that situation.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no. As the gentleman from Maine said, and as I have repeatedly said, nobody can seriously insist that either the original amendment or this amendment as it stands now directed any reduction to the lowest zone. It does not direct a reduction or an increase; it simply directs the commission to make an equal allocation and leaves it with them to bring about an equalization by reductions or increases or both. The persistent charges to that effect were made by people who were trying to mislead the public or else they did not know what they were talking about and could not understand plain English language.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] frankly stated that he opposed the Davis amendment, but that the present Senate or conference amendment is quite satisfactory to the opponents of the original Davis amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Clearly that would show there is confusion and there is division as to the interpretation of the amendment in the conference report.

Mr. DAVIS. We have a peculiar situation here. This House adopted the original equalization amendment by a vote of 236 to 134. Now, when it is reported back with amendments, what is the situation?

The large majority that passed the amendment and those who have undertaken to act for them think that the equalization amendment as it passed the House needed no explanatory amendments added thereto, and on the other hand, those in the House who fought the amendment, those who tried to destroy it on a point of order and then upon a vote, seem to get some comfort out of the language added in conference, and are willing to support the conference report. However, I do not think that the equalization provision, as amended in conference, is susceptible of the interpretation which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] suggested that they probably had in mind in adding certain language to the amendment.

There is an old adage that "history repeats itself," and that is happening in this case, as I shall point out. There is another adage that "a burnt child dreads the fire." I suppose that does not apply to adults.

In the last Congress our Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported out a distribution clause which was substantially the same as the one that passed this time except it used the word "equitable" instead of the word "equal." There was no criticism or any opposition on the part of anybody in the House to that. It passed the House. It went to conference. It was changed in conference, and then when the conference report came to the House I made a speech in which I pointed out the changes, and I called particular attention to the changes in the distribution amendment, and I declared that it was rendered ambiguous and that two interpretations could be placed upon it, and I also pointed out in specific terms that it might be interpreted to mean that all that was required was a distribution of equitable service, and that might be rendered by stations in distant States without the States served having any stations within their midst.

I call attention to this not in a spirit of "I told you so" but in order to convince you, if I may, that I am not simply quibbling on words. I do not quibble on words, but I am strongly in favor of saying just what we mean and meaning just what we say in all legislation. Now, what resulted?

At the hearings on this bill recently we examined the members of the Radio Commission who were called upon to interpret that and other provisions, and Judge Sykes, the lawyer member of the commission, said, referring to this distribution clause:

> A great many people for whose opinion I have the highest regard and respect, eminent lawyers, have this idea as I understand of that clause of the law, that if a State or a community in a State is getting good radio service from stations in other States, then that State and community are getting good radio service and, therefore, that State or community is being served, and as a State or community in a State is not entitled to a radio station. That is not my opinion of this clause of the law. My opinion of that clause is it means it was put there to give the States their pro rata quota of radio stations and to communities in States, and that has been my insistence as a member of the Federal Radio Commission on the construction of that section of the law.

And he also stated that he thought the present provision should be clarified and he hoped it would be.

Now, Commissioner Pickard placed the same interpretation upon it as Commissioner Sykes, but Commissioner Caldwell, when he was asked about it, testified as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. You are in accord with the spirit of the act which specifies specifically that there shall be an equitable distribution?

Commissioner CALDWELL. Of radio stations?

Mr. BRIGGS. Of the different broadcast bands, frequencies and so forth, among the various States and communities.

Commissioner CALDWELL. I have read this provision very carefully, sir, and I do not find the statement there that transmitters, powers, or wave lengths shall be divided equitably among the States and communities.

Mr. BRIGGS. Oh, I do not say divided equally.

Commissioner CALDWELL. I say equitably. I say I do not find the statement that they shall be divided equitably. I find the statement that they shall be so divided that the radio service shall be equitable. Now, that is quite different.

And so it was.

Now, in the face of the history of that legislative action and the result thereof, we are doing exactly the same thing that we did before. There is something else involved in this whole controversy, and that is that the commission and the Government representing all the people will probably be confronted in the courts with a claim of "vested rights."

Why, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], made two or three speeches on the floor of this House in which he asserted the doctrine of vested rights.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And will the gentleman say right there that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], to give them these vested rights was voted down?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; and fortunately that showed the attitude and intent of the Congress.

Now, this House passed the White radio bill in the last Congress, in which it unmistakably showed and asserted that there were no vested rights and that they could not be acquired, and so did the Senate; but when at the end of the first session of the last Congress the conferees were unable to agree upon the bill as a whole, what did we do? We unanimously reported a resolution which restricted the period of time for applications, and in the same connection also used this language—I will read the resolution which was reported unanimously and unanimously passed by the House and by the Senate and signed by the President and became the law:

No station license shall be granted by the commission or by the Secretary of Commerce unless the applicant therefor shall execute in writing a waiver of any right or of any claim to any right as against the United States to any wave lengths or to the use of the ether in radio transmission because of previous license to use the same or because of the use thereof.

Now, that was the resolution, and similar provisions were contained in the House and Senate bills. But when the bill got to conference this resolution was repealed in the conference report bill. Provisions that were in both the House and the Senate bills were changed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter. We did not ask for any extension of time, but I think a unanimous-consent request to extend the time would not meet with any opposition. We spent two whole days in debating the same proposition before the House.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. DAVIS. Ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for 20 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent the time for the consideration of the conference report be extended an additional 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. But the conference report was adopted. Now what was the result. I called attention in my speech on the conference report at the last session to the changes with respect to vested rights. I warned of the danger, I pointed out the fact that in my opinion it would encourage, if not strengthen the cause of those that were asserting vested rights and to show what they think. I call attention to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] said the other day on the proposition.

In his remarks of March 7, 1928, the gentleman from New York declared in part as follows:

Should the commission, however, refuse to issue a license to a station existing before the law, the question of vested rights of such owner arise.

It is the opinion of the writer that if anyone has used the ether for a period of time, he has a vested right to continue that use, subject to regulation by the United States Government.

This opinion is based upon a fair construction of the language of section 5 of the act of 1927, as deduced from a reading of that section together with a study of the history of this provision.

Section 5 provides that—

"No station license shall be granted by the commission or by the Secretary of Commerce until the applicant therefor shall have signed a waiver of any claim to the use of any particular frequency or wave length or of the ether as against the regulatory power of the United States, because of the previous use of the same, whether by license or otherwise."

The history of this provision shows that on July 3, 1926, Congress passed Joint Resolution 123, which became law on December 8, 1926. This resolution provided that no license or renewal should be granted—"unless the applicant therefor shall execute in writing a waiver of any right or of any claim to any right, as against the United States, to any wave length or to the use of the ether in radio transmission because of previous license to use the same or because of the use thereof."

When the radio act of 1927 was enacted this resolution was specifically repealed by section 39 of the radio act, and the new language of section 5, quoted above, was substituted.

It will be noted that in the language of the joint resolution enforced prior to the radio act the applicant for a license had to sign a waiver of any right or claim to any right as against the United States," while in the new radio act now in force the waiver is as to any claim as against the regulatory power of the United States.

Under the language of the resolution it seems to the writer that the licensee would become a mere tenant at will of the Government, and that under the resolution the Government could at any time order him to desist; and if so, he would have no legal right to continue and would have no remedy other than his constitutional right to just compensation.

The language of the new radio act, however, modifies the provision of the resolution and merely says that the applicant for license must sign a waiver of right as against the regulatory powers of the United States.

I deem the language as modified by the act of 1927 to mean that the licensee is merely subject to "regulation" by the Government.

If a radio station has been established under the law of 1912, and its license has not been revoked "for cause" as provided for in that act, it would seem to the writer that he would have a vested right to continue to use the ether under the new 1927 act, subject only to the regulatory power of the United States.

I am of the opinion that Congress under section 5 can subject the station owners to any reasonable regulations deemed necessary for the public welfare, but that it can not arbitrarily abrogate all privileges.

While the changes of the provisions with respect to vested rights made by the conferees last year have encouraged those who would claim such rights with respect to radiobroadcasting privileges, yet I will frankly state that I do not think that they have or can acquire any such vested rights. I do not think that they would have the alleged vested rights, even though there had been no legislation on the subject. However, I protested against the changes because I knew that such changes would encourage them to claim vested rights.

As a matter of fact, all of the arguments advanced by the gentleman from New York and others in favor of the existence of vested rights on the part of broadcasting stations, the claim that the Government can not refuse a license for the continued operation of a broadcasting station can not stop the station from operating, and if the Government did so it would amount to confiscation for which the Government would be liable in damages, have all been completely answered and refuted by the Supreme Court of the United States in a line of decisions commencing with the case of Kidd against Pearson, in which similar claims were made in connection with the laws prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Now, some thought that I was then quibbling over language. However, with respect to my position on the conference changes in the provisions relating to both equitable distribution and vested rights, everybody must admit that I was vindicated by the subsequent events.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand the gentleman's position is that if the commission now in existence will carry out the evident purpose and intent of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], that that is what the amendment means, that would be satisfactory to you?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes. As I stated in the outset, the interpretation placed on the amendment as reported by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] is entirely in conformity with my interpretation of the amendment as it passed the House and in conformity with my views.

In my opinion the equalization amendment as reported by the conferees is no different in substance and effect from the amendment as it passed the House. Some of the conferees insisted upon adding what might be termed explanatory provisions. While those provisions were unnecessary, yet in my opinion the equalization provision as amended in conference can not be naturally or fairly interpreted any differently than the amendment as it passed the House.

What I am objecting to is that those who are disposed to do so might discover some pretext in the added language to distort the clear meaning and subvert the unmistakable purpose of the equalization provision as it passed the House. The House conferees are supposed to carry out the wishes of the House. The language to which I most object was not requested by the Senate conferees; they are willing to accept the provision with or without that language.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I see that we are favored in the gallery by the members of the Radio Commission. It must be evident to them as well as the public that with the broad and clarifying statement of the chairman of the committee [Mr. WHITE] and the interpretation of it by the gentleman from Tennessee that this amendment in the present form means that there must be equal allocation in the various zones. That is the view that the gentleman from Tennessee takes, is it not?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; there is no difference about that. I think any sort of fair interpretation means what was stated by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] is in error?

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman from Massachusetts refers to the declaration of purpose that has been inserted ahead of the provision as it passed the House.

That was clearly implied, in my opinion, and I think there can be no question about it in the original amendment as it passed the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the interpretation which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] puts to the amendment as it comes from the conferees is entirely different from the interpretation which the gentleman places upon it and which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] placed upon it, and he was frank enough to so state.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. There is one phrase which I have not heard any comment upon. Beginning on the bottom of the page—

> The licensing authority shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, whenever necessary or proper.

As I understand, the contention is that this equality is always proper. Is this meant to leave it to the commission to determine whether the equality is proper?

Mr. DAVIS. No, indeed. I ask the gentleman to read further on—> * * * shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, when necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewal of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, when applications are made for licenses or renewal of licenses.

Mr. HOCH. Of course, that is the means by which they are to bring about this equality, but the phrase seems to limit the declaration that they shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service heretofore directed, whenever necessary or proper. What is "whenever necessary or proper"? Whenever equality is necessary or proper?

Mr. DAVIS. The words, "whenever necessary or proper," modify the language directing the granting or refusal of licenses or renewals, changing station power and so forth.

Mr. HOCH. Does not the gentleman think that equality is always proper?

Mr. DAVIS. Absolutely.

Mr. HOCH. Then why should you say they should carry into effect equality whenever they think equality is proper.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no; if the gentleman from Tennessee will yield. It is the changes or reductions. The changes of wave lengths, in order to produce equality. They should be affected whenever necessary and proper. Is not that the intent?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. I say this to the gentleman from Kansas. It was apprehended that the use of that other clause, "where and in so far as there are applications therefor," might be construed to prevent the commission from making any changes unless those changes were asked for; in other words, that they could not reduce a station from 50,000-watt power to some lower power unless the station asked to be reduced, and in order to make it clear that they could make changes and reductions even though not applied for, this other provision was adopted. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, there is no question whatsoever that the House intended that all sections of the country have equality in broadcasting facilities. I have heard no one dispute the equity and fairness of that proposition. I have known of no vote that was cast against the Davis amendment that was predicated on the proposition that one section of the country was entitled to better broadcasting facilities than any other section of the country. The only opposition that existed to my knowledge to the Davis amendment when it was presented to the House was that it might unnecessarily disturb present conditions without accomplishing the purpose of increasing the broadcasting facilities demanded by another section of the country.

I was appointed as a member of the managers on the part of the House to participate in the conference on this bill with the implied understanding that I was to represent the views of the House, and if I had not been willing to represent the views of the House that there should be equality of broadcasting facilities among the zones into which the country by the act was divided, I would not have accepted this appointment. [Applause.]

The only question in the conference was how that purpose could be safeguarded without the unnecessary and wanton injury to existing facilities. We all acquiesced in the statement of principle which underlay the Davis amendment, to wit:

> It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio-broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of any sane person who understands English, I assert that the fact that a zone is entitled to equality of reception of broadcasting does not mitigate or in any way detract from its right to have that same equality in transmission. To further the purpose of the Davis amendment this language was written by Senator DILL and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], both of whom are unequivocally in favor of principle of the Davis amendment. I read the language:

> and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor.

Of course, if some section of the country does not want wave lengths, does not want power, what useful purpose would be served to deprive another section of the country of those wave lengths and that power?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I have read the language of the amendment of the conferees and I can not see myself how it in any way contravenes the action of the House. As I understand it, they shall make these different allocations to bring about equality if they have applications from some section that is deficient; and if they do not have applications from deficient zones, there is no reason to take wave lengths and power from other zones that have them. Is not that the purpose?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. That is what I understood.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. But later on if that station comes in and asks for an allocation, they will take it away from the other zones?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is your attitude the same as Mr. WHITE'S on this proposition?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; we see eye for eye, and stand toe to toe on this proposition. We are both for equality.

Mr. ABERNETHY. That means the carrying out of the intent of Congress?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Now, in the opinion of the conferees, that language which I have just read allows the Radio Commission to establish such equality; and in view of the present situation, that the radio field is saturated and all the power is at present used that can be used under the present development of the art, and the fact that there are more station licenses than can usefully be coordinated, it necessarily follows that where it was needed to build up a zone some other zone would necessarily have to be stripped of some of its power.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if there is any doubt at all in his mind as to whether or not the commission would have the right to reduce the power of an existing station below that which it then had or applied for in its application for a renewal of the license?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Of course. As a matter of fact, without this additional authority the commission is doing it to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand. But you think, in other words, that there is no doubt at all but that they have the right to make a reduction, even though the applicant applies for the same power and privileges that it now has?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Absolutely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Anyone operating on a temporary license acquires no permanent rights?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No. There are no vested rights in radio transmission. That is the fundamental principle upon which the whole radio legislation is based. There is no vested right in the use of the ether or the air in transmitting radio energy.

Now, the conferees thought that this language, which I read, which Senator DILL and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] wrote, was sufficient to accomplish the purpose of the Davis amendment.

Mr. DAVIS himself desired to clarify it, and he wrote a provision which on my own motion was incorporated in this compromise. It is merely a restating in other language what Senator DILL and the gentleman from Maine drew and agreed to, as follows:

> The licensing authority shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, whenever necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, when applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses.

That is simply a rephrasing of the White-Dill proposition, and we put them both in. There are two separate directions to the commission to bring about this equality. They both mean the same thing, but they are couched in different language.

Now, objection is made to the White-Dill proposition because it includes this phrase, "When and in so far as there are applications therefor." Judge DAVIS rewrote the White-Dill proposition. What is his concluding phrase? It is, "When applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses." It is exactly the same phrase as is carried in the White-Dill language, to which he takes exception. What this hullabaloo is about I can not, for the life of me, fathom. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WHITE of Maine, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was adopted was laid on the table.

THE "S–4"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen, I want to pay a tribute to the dead of the S–4.

On December 17, 1927, the S–4 sank beneath the sea off Provincetown, carrying with her to an untimely death 40 of the flower of the Nation. The indignation of the public was stirred to white heat because this catastrophe was only one of a long train of disasters which on good authority are considered inexcusable. Even the Navy itself consented to an investigation and the President made it the subject of a special message.

The Butler resolution was passed by the House on January 7. It was amended and passed in the Senate on January 30. Conferees were appointed and for 50 days there has been silence—no word, no report whatever.

The failure of the conferees in this matter lays bare one of the most pernicious weaknesses in our legislative system. No group of men in a republic ought to have the power to strangle legislation in this way.

Both Houses, the President, and the people of the country demand that the causes of this catastrophe shall be investigated and that a serious study of safety devices and appliances shall be made at once. We owe that to the men who made this sacrifice.

TO THE DEAD OF THE "S–4"

Three times the moon the zodiac has strode
And gazed with pity on your dark abode;
The snow, the rain, the winter gales have swept
The sea, 'neath which your tryst with death was kept.

Courageous sons, we hail your iron nerve!
You risked your lives Columbia to serve—
And dying, never doubted she would keep
The faith and lift your vessel from the deep;
Whate'er the past that she would make amends:
Restore your hallowed bodies to your friends.

Unselfish dead—one promise has been kept:
The sepulcher of steel in which you slept
Is raised at last by faithful comrades' skill—
And your remains a martyr's grave will fill!
'Twas glibly purred: Your death was not in vain—
From your untimely end would spring some gain:
"Such tragedies could ne'er occur again!"
But what's been done to keep the promise true?
What has been done to keep the faith with you?
What has been done to keep the faith with them,
Our cruel neglects to similar fates condemn?

Shall we forget your sacrifice so great
And shirk our duty in affairs of state?
If there's no pity for your moldering bones
Your death itself our base ingratitude atones!
The age in which we live you have retrieved,
For you have given what you ne'er received—
Loyalty! and thus confirmed the ancient truth:
A nation's honor rests upon its youth!
Posterity will praise and hold you high
When quibbling statesmen shall have sunk in obloquy!

[Applause.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12286, the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12286, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Pending that motion, I suggest that we consider for a moment an arrangement as to time. There has been considerable demand for time on this side. I understand from my colleague from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] that there is considerable demand for time on the other side, and possibly it would be unwise to fix the time for general debate now. I wonder what the gentleman's reaction may be?

Mr. AYRES. My idea is that it would not be advisable to fix any definite time at all just now.

Mr. FRENCH. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the time be not fixed, but that it be equally divided between the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] and myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Idaho, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12286, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12286, the naval appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, probably no supply bill that the Congress is called upon to consider requires such close coordination of all its parts as does the appropriation bill for the Naval Establishment. Ships, shore stations, officers, men, fuel, aircraft, all are related, and the expansion of any one item is reflected in the terms of many others. If a cruiser or an airplane be proposed and its need demonstrated, you then must inquire as to its cost, the number of officers and men whose services will be drawn upon, the constant charges for operation and maintenance, and the degree in which it will fit in with other component parts of an immense institution.

The appropriations for the support of the Navy for the several years commencing with 1921 have been as follows:

Appropriations

Year	Direct	Indirect	Total

[2] Maximum.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can the gentleman give us the aggregate of the appropriations from 1921 down to the present time.

Mr. FRENCH. It would be approximately $2,700,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is for the Navy in seven years?

Mr. FRENCH. For eight years. The present bill carries a total appropriation of $369,190,737.

EXPANDING NAVAL COSTS

This is the largest bill for the support of our naval arm in point of money carried that the House has been called upon to consider since the conclusion of the treaty limiting naval armaments. This is brought about chiefly by the mounting cost of naval aviation and the heavier ship construction draft that may be expected during 1929 by reason of the fact that all of the eight 10,000-ton cruisers authorized in 1924 will be under construction at one time.

The committee can vision no prospect of declining naval costs in the immediate future. Indeed, all indications point to an appreciable and immediate upward trend. The additional expense that will be occasioned by the enactment of H. R. 11526, passed by the House on the 17th instant, was indicated during the consideration of that measure. In addition, replacement construction, continuing with the modernization program, and aviation expansion, coupled with increasing maintenance and operating costs, all will occasion an annual outlay of proportions sufficient to swell the aggregate of future annual appropriation bills to sums considerably in excess of the total of the bill herewith presented. In a much greater degree will this be true if capital ship replacement shall proceed as contemplated by the existing treaty and if we shall find it necessary not only to replace but increase the number of ships of other types and to add new types.

These prospective additional burdens can be alleviated in a measure by curbing expenses in a greater degree in directions that I shall suggest during my remarks.

THE FLEET

The following is a list of the ships it is planned to have in commission during the fiscal year 1929:

Battleships (first line)	16
Cruisers (second line)	2
Light cruisers:
First line	10
Second line	3
Aircraft carriers:
First line	2
Second line	1
Mine layers (second line)	2
Destroyers (first line)	103
Light mine layers	6
Submarines:
First line	46
Second line	29
Fleet submarines (first line)	5
Patrol vessels:
Eagle boats	2
Gunboats	12
Converted yachts	5
Auxiliaries	74
Total	318

The plan calls for one more fleet submarine and one less converted yacht being in commission during 1929 than were planned to be in commission during the present fiscal year. Otherwise, there is no change as to numbers.

The matériel condition of the fleet has been represented to the committee as being generally good. Appropriations have not been adequate to permit of vessels being kept fully equipped with all of the latest instruments or devices which tend to make the ships increasingly efficient, both from an operative standpoint and in battle effectiveness. Development of such devices is so rapid that it raises the question as to just how far we should go in that respect. Reasonable progress along lines that represent latest thought, and repair and maintenance that mean efficiency of existing types, we have tried to keep in mind and make provision for.

PERSONNEL

The personnel situation as regards numbers is depicted as follows:

	Estimated, 1929
Officers, active (line, staff, and warrant)	8,745
Midshipmen	1,746
Officers, retired	1,690
Enlisted men:
Exclusive of additional for Veterans' Bureau	83,250
Retired	1,498

LINE OFFICERS

Of line officers, the estimates include provision for an average of 5,314. On September 30 last the actual number stood at 5,423. The authorized number is 5,499. The Naval Academy is the source of our line officers. The number of appointments thereto by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress was reduced from five to three in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1924, and that action is being reflected at this time in the smaller number of graduates. The situation will begin to improve with the next graduating class, and by 1932, at a normal rate of attrition during the interim, any deficiency in the authorized number of line officers most probably will have been wholly met. Aviation, however, is imposing heavy demands on the line strength. The present aircraft program alone will require, when completed, 916 officer aviators upon the basis of the present theory of supplying aviation personnel. On January 1 last 458 line officers were employed as aviators and observers. In addition to these, 22 officers were in training on such date and 96 others were engaged on ground duty having to do with naval aviation.

While there is a great surplus of officers on the basis of enlisted strength, whether or not demands and employments not contemplated, when the present authorized strength was established in 1916, in addition to aviation, more than absorb such surplus the committee is not prepared to say. Aviation will continue to draw increasingly on line officers under existing policy, since we are told that the five-year aircraft program now being developed fails to provide planes for the cruisers now being built and certainly not for any vessels not now authorized. The committee believes that there should be a reexamination of line-officer personnel requirements.

In the absence of one, however, it does not desire to assume the responsibility for advocating a course that might result in a hurtful shortage of officer personnel in any branch of naval activity. Pursuantly, it is proposing in the accompanying bill to increase the number of appointments to Annapolis of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress from three to four. Unless the authorized officer strength be increased before these additional appointees may be graduated, it is quite probable that the number of graduates will exceed the number of vacancies.

ENLISTED MEN

For the present fiscal year appropriations were provided to maintain an average of 83,250 men. This number will be exceeded by approximately 400, because distribution in pay grades has not conformed to the estimate, thus releasing sufficient funds to provide compensation for the excess number.

This bill provides for 83,250 men on the basis of the predicted pay grade distribution. The bill is not designed to provide for any fewer number, and if as shaped under the one-fund clause applying to pay, subsistence, and transportation, it is found that a greater number may be carried within the total provided for such objects the matter could be handled through departmental administration. It should be noted in this connection that the number of vessels that will be in commission during 1929 will remain essentially, if not exactly, the same as planned for the present fiscal year.

NAVAL RESERVE

For the Naval Reserve we are carrying $4,020,000, in addition to $9,232,572 which must be paid to men who have been transferred to the Naval Reserve after many years' service with the Navy proper. The amount for both purposes is an increase over the current year and we believe will meet every legitimate need.

TRANSFERRED RESERVISTS

The naval appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, authorized the transfer of enlisted men to the Fleet Naval Reserve upon the completion of 16 or 20 years' naval service, in which status they receive as a retainer, if transferred after 16 years' service, one-third of the base pay at time of transfer plus all permanent additions thereto, and, if transferred after 20 years' service, one-half of the base pay at time of transfer plus all permanent additions thereto. Such men, when their combined time in the Navy and in the Fleet Reserve aggregates 30 years, assume an actual instead of a nominal retired status and their pay then becomes three-fourths of the base pay they were receiving when transferred to the Fleet Reserve plus the allowances to which enlisted men of the same rating are entitled after 30 years' naval service. By the act approved February 28, 1925, it was provided as to men enlisting subsequently to that date that 20 years' naval service must precede transfer to the Fleet Reserve. The law extends to both the Navy and Marine Corps.

At our request the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Admiral Leigh, one of the admirals of the Navy of finest integrity and of soundest judgment, submitted to our committee a statement showing what would be the increases upon the demands in support of this factor during the next few years. We asked the admiral to submit the figures so as to bring out the costs by years at intervals of 10 years. Remember that the intervening years carry their progressively increasing amounts.

Admiral Leigh has estimated that the cost figure will increase as follows until 1980, when the peak will be reached:

1940	19,459,207
1950	23,183,520
1960	27,953,763
1980	32,829,960

These figures, of course, are subject to fluctuations in personnel strength. The committee suggests that consideration be given to offering as an alternative to men now in the service and as a substitute to those who may hereafter enlist a cash bonus upon discharge after 20 years' service equivalent to one year's pay plus all permanent additions thereto.

SUBMARINES

Prompted by the tragic disaster to the submarine S–4, the committee conducted an exhaustive inquiry into possible ways of building or equipping subsurface craft so as to lessen the chance of disaster and so as to do everything practicable looking to the rescue of personnel when imperiled from any cause. The hearings are replete with illuminating statements on this subject. It may be said to the credit of all officers who appeared before the committee and who had served in submarines, both in command and in subordinate capacities, that they advocate nothing for personnel protection that would detract in any measure from the military value of such craft. Also, the committee found complete accord between design, construction, and operating personnel.

Submarine service carries with it hazards greater than extend to most branches of naval activity. We have had our appalling losses, but so have other nations. Since 1919 the United States has lost 89 of her officers and men attached to submarine duty, but during that time Great Britain has lost 200 officers and men and Japan 135.

It will not do for us to say that because the United States has been more fortunate than other countries that we have attained a point beyond which we should not go.

With this thought we are carrying in the bill $200,000 for examination and experimental purposes by the Navy Department.

We did not carry money for pontoons because we were told frankly by the officers of the department that they were not in accord upon a policy that was definite enough to justify us in making an appropriation; and as for a salvage ship, the bill was passed only last week by the House authorizing preparation of plans for such a ship, and as the measure is not law, manifestly our bill could not carry money for the purposes proposed.

FUEL

When it comes to the matter of steaming we approach another question that involves large amounts of money.

For fuel and transportation the Budget estimate is $10,690,000, as against $12,000,000 for the current fiscal year, a reduction of $1,310,000. There has been a reduction in the average price of fuel oil from $1.33228 per barrel to $1.16048, in consequence of which a sum approximately $1,000,000 of the current appropriation will not be used. In view of this unanticipated surplus in the current funds, the reduction proposed in the Budget actually is around $300,000. But on account of the lower price of fuel oil the steaming provided was actually increased.

The committee is proposing $10,319,656, or $370,344 less than the Budget estimate, arrived at in this way: The average amount of fuel oil consumed during the fiscal years 1926 and 1927 and estimated to be consumed during the fiscal year 1928 is 6,454,725 barrels. By fiscal years the figures run roundly 6,480,000, 6,260,000, and 6,625,000, respectively. To this average figure the committee has added the estimated consumption of fuel oil during the fiscal year 1929 by the two new aircraft carriers—Lexington and Saratoga—and the total is 359,558 barrels less than the steaming plans call for. In fact, your committee is of the opinion that somewhat less steaming should be considered rather than plans for greater steaming. It is recognized that a proper amount of steaming is necessary if for no other than the very important reason of familiarizing personnel with the functioning of these masses of floating mechanism, but there is a point where wear must enter the equation and should have the serious attention of the department and the Congress.

AVIATION

July 1, next, will usher in the third year of the five-year program authorized by the act approved June 24, 1926, intended by annual increments to provide the Navy with 1,000 "useful airplanes." When the program period commenced on July 1, 1926, eliminating all planes on hand not coming within the definition of "useful airplanes," the Navy possessed 351 planes on hand and 288 on order. Starting from this point the following table shows the progress made and the predicted status at the end of the fiscal year 1929, during which orders will be placed for 299 planes:

	On hand	Deliveries during year	Wastage	Situation at end of year
July 1—
1926	351	256	139	468
1927	468	419	182	705
1928	705	[1] 270	[1] 175	[1] 750
1929	750	[1] 271	[1] 238	[1] 783

Assuming that by the end of the fiscal year 1929 the estimated number of 783 useful planes on hand to be correct, it is predicted that during the fiscal years 1930 and 1931, 369 and 401 planes, respectively, will need to be ordered to round out the program on schedule.

LIGHTER THAN AIR

In the act of June 24, 1926 (44 Stat. 764), authority was carried for the construction of two rigid airships of approximately 6,000,000 cubic feet capacity each, at a cost of not to exceed $8,000,000 for both ships. The naval appropriation act for the current fiscal year carried an appropriation of $200,000 toward the construction of one of these airships at a limit of cost of $4,500,000. That appropriation has not been obligated. It appears that a fixed-price contract can not be concluded for the construction of a single airship at a maximum figure of $4,500,000. Representations have been made that the two ships can be built, under a fixed-price contract, for a total cost of $8,000,000. The accompanying bill has been framed to enable that to be done. In addition to the previous appropriation of $200,000 the bill carries $1,800,000 to apply on such a contract during the fiscal year 1929. It was indicated to the committee that construction of the two vessels would not proceed simultaneously and that "full provision would be made in the contract that the second ship should incorporate the results of lessons learned in the design and construction of the first one, and with the interest of the Government further protected by the right of cancellation of the second ship if changing circumstances make that advisable." The appropriation has been proposed with that understanding, fortified by a legislative provision requiring that the contract shall carry a cancellation clause and a clause limiting the Government's total financial obligation should the cancellation right be exercised.

As aviation has expanded, we have needed to expand our personnel. On January 1 last we had 758 commissioned and warrant officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps attached to aviation and 8,616 enlisted personnel. Adding to these figures 2,317 civilian employees, we have to-day in naval aviation approximately 10,933 personnel of all kinds.

Measured in money, naval aviation for 1929 will cost $32,735,000.

Mr. RAGON. Can the gentleman give the figures of the personnel attached to aviation from the Army?

Mr. FRENCH. Not accurately; it may be that some one from the Military Committee can give this information.

Mr. TABER. Approximately 11,500.

Mr. RAGON. And what were the figures the gentleman gave for the Navy?

Mr. FRENCH. For the Navy we have 758 commissioned and warrant officers as of January 1, and 8,616 enlisted personnel. In addition, we have 2,317 civilian employees, making a grand total of 10,933.

MARINE CORPS

For the Marine Corps we are providing for the establishment based on 1,176 commissioned, commissioned warrant, and warrant officers and 18,000 enlisted personnel.

Mr. UPDIKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. UPDIKE. Was any provision made for Marine Reserves?

Mr. FRENCH. We are providing for them, and while we can discuss that question more adequately under the five-minute rule, we are carrying something for expansion.

MODERNIZING BATTLESHIPS

Authorization was contained in section 2 of the act of March 2, 1927, for the modernization of the U. S. S. Nevada and Oklahoma at a total cost of $13,150,000. Half of this sum was appropriated in the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, and the estimates the committee considered included the remainder. Work of overhaul commenced in December, at which time it was the expectation that the ships would be completed and back in service by July 1, 1929. Since the work was started it has developed that it might be necessary to do other work not contemplated by the authorization.

These two ships will make a total of eight of our capital ships to undergo extensive overhaul since the calendar year 1924. It developed during the course of the hearings that as to the other six, in addition to the money expended on them pursuant to the authorization act approved December 28, 1924, maintenance appropriations were dipped into to the extent of $300,000 for each vessel. Such procedure was entirely lawful but work of such proportions, in addition to that contemplated by the authorization act, should have been foreseen and made a part of the recommendation for modernization legislation. The course pursued used moneys which could better have been employed in effecting improvements needed on ships of other types.

The committee wishes to avoid a repetition of this action in connection with the major overhaul of the Nevada and Oklahoma and, consequently, is attaching to the appropriation on account of such vessels a proviso denying the use of other appropriations for altering, improving, or repairing such ships.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY

There is included under this head in the estimates and in the accompanying bill $48,000,000. The comparative figure for this year, including a transfer of $5,115,000 from the naval supply account fund, is $39,615,000.

The 1929 funds will be applied as indicated in the following table:

Vessels (number, type, and unit cost)	Appropriation proposed, 1929			Remaining to be appropriated
	Construction and machinery	Ordnance	Total
2 submarines, V-5 and V-6 ($6,320,000)	$1,350,000	$540,000	$1,890,000	[1] $2,900,000
2 cruisers, Nos. 24 and 25 ($16,750,000)	5,600,000	2,200,000	7,800,000	450,000
3 cruisers, Nos. 26, 27, and 30 ($16,750,000)	11,550,000	9,450,000	21,000,000	13,800,000
3 cruisers, Nos. 28, 29, and 31 ($16,750,000)	13,000,000	4,310,000	17,310,000	32,490,000
Total	31,500,000	16,500,000	48,000,000	49,640,000

[1] Contingent upon authorization.

The fiscal year 1930 will see all of the above ships practically completed. A final appropriation of about $10,000,000 will need to be provided in the fiscal year 1931 to wind up the work.

No limit of cost heretofore has been imposed on the armor, armaments, and ammunition for light cruisers 29, 30, and 31. Such limit for ordnance on the other five cruisers is fixed at $5,650,000 per vessel. The committee is including provision in the appropriation, "Increase of the Navy," limiting the ordnance costs on account of light cruisers 29, 30, and 31 to $5,650,000 per vessel.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I want to find out what is responsible for the difference in these figures on new construction and the figures the gentleman gave the other day in considering the naval authorization bill, indicating that there would be spent on new construction for the coming year about $72,000,000.

Mr. FRENCH. My figures to which the gentleman refers as having been made last week included not only money for purposes that are in the pending bill, but included also money for the proposed program.

Mr. TABER. And included aviation also.

Mr. BLACK of New York. What does aviation amount to? I think the figures that I am giving are strictly the figures on the authorized appropriations, and the gentleman had another line for the expense entailed in the bill. Of course, the gentleman was not giving us figures the other day on anything unauthorized.

Mr. FRENCH. I have my remarks right here, and I would say that as I analyzed the question the other day I took into consideration the amounts carried in the proposed program. What year did the gentleman refer to—1929?

Mr. BLACK of New York. 1929. What are the figures as of the other day for 1929, on new construction?

Mr. FRENCH. The existing program I indicated as calling for $72,240,000, which included the aircraft that were authorized, and included $6,575,000 for modernization of two battleships.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman know what aviation happens to be on new construction? We have $48,000,000 of naval new construction, and the difference between $48,000,000 and $72,000,000 would have to be aviation.

Mr. TABER. Fifteen million five hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. FRENCH. That is approximately the figure?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Then the figures of the other day were not strictly what the gentleman had in mind for this year?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. They are about $7,000,000 short.

Mr. FRENCH. No. My figures are correct. If the gentleman will let me follow through, I think he will agree that my statement of last week and my statement of to-day are in accord. Probably I should say that in my table the other day I included for 1929, $635,000 for additional aircraft, and we are not carrying that in the present bill. Why? Because these aircraft are not authorized. So if the gentleman will regard my statements of to-day as pertaining to projects that have been authorized, and my statements of last week as including in addition programs that will be authorized in all likelihood, I am sure he will find that the totals are correct for the purposes intended.

POSSIBLE PROGRAMS

Under the terms of the limitation of armaments treaty—chapter 3, article 21—the United States, after consultation with the other contracting powers, shall arrange for a conference of all the contracting powers, which shall convene as soon as possible after the expiration of eight years from the coming into force of the present treaty, to consider what changes, if any, in the treaty may be necessary to meet new developments.

This conference will thus fall due in 1931.

What shall we look forward to by way of a modification of the existing program? I trust we may have reason to anticipate an agreement upon types of ships not now limited in the treaty as to total tonnage, and that such agreement may fix among the powers signatory to the treaty, and possibly other powers that may desire to unite, limitations that may ease the mind of thoughtful people on the question of competitive building of ships. This should be done in the interest of world peace.

To-day when we are considering the money bill for the Naval Establishment of the United States I naturally think of possible new programs that may mean possible lessening of the costs of naval armaments. Probably all the world will recognize that the United States just now is able to bear heavy burdens better than any other of the world powers. Even so, the burdens for the Naval Establishment rest heavily upon our people, and with our vast resources can we not afford to invite other nations to consider if naval burdens may be reduced?

If that be so, it ought to be the easier thing for the United States to take the lead in discussing in its great legislative body and in outlining the policies through its administration ways and means by which reductions can be brought about. It is a fine and generous thing for a strong power to do.

The replacement cost of the ships of the United States would be approximately $1,200,000,000. They tell us that the life of a military ship is approximately 20 years. If that be so, you have already calculated in your mind that the annual cost of replacement of our ships is $60,000,000. Suppose we add the program to the establishment that you authorized the other day. You will then increase the replacement cost annually from $60,000,000 to $75,000,000 or $80,000,000. What can we do to meet this situation?

The figures are startling. Unless we can find a way to reduce construction of ships of war, if we are to maintain our ratio among the powers of the world, this will be our share of "the white man's burden."

CAN WE EXTEND THE LIFE OF NAVAL CRAFT?

When I directed your attention a moment ago to the total replacement cost of our naval craft you will remember I used 20 as a division to obtain the annual cost, because 20 years in a rough way is taken as an arbitrary life of most ships of military type.

This average life is due in large measure to obsolescence. In types of craft where intricate machinery bulks large, obsolescence advances with great rapidity. At the Geneva conference last year proposals were considered of fixing the life of various types. Hon. W. C. Bridgeman, speaking before the plenary conference on June 20, 1927, suggests the following: Capital ships, 26 years; 8-gun cruisers, 24 years; destroyers, 20 years; and submarines, 15 years. Other suggestions of life were offered as the conference proceeded. No results were attained. But may we not pursue this question? If obsolescence is a controlling factor in fixing the life of battleships or cruisers or submarines, then if all nations were to agree upon a definite arbitrary life of more extended years, obsolescence would be a factor common in like measure to all nations, and hence no nation would be placed at disadvantage by extending the average period of replacement. Suppose the annual replacement cost of the ships of the Navy of the United States is $60,000,000 annually, as it is to-day, fixed upon an average life of 20 years for our ships, and the average life could be extended to 25 years, this would mean that the annual replacement cost would be reduced by $12,000,000 or down to $48,000,000. If the annual replacement cost were $80,000,000, the reduction would be $16,000,000.

REDUCE NUMBER WITHIN TYPES

May I suggest another possible program? Why by agreement should we not strike lower figures in numbers of types of ships beyond which we may not build? Let me make an illustration. Under the Washington treaty after 1934 the tonnage of the United States and of Great Britain in battleships will be 525,000 tons each; Japan, 315,000 tons; and France and Italy each 175,000 tons. Some of the older ships by that time will be replaced by new, and three battleships will be withdrawn from our fleet, not again to be replaced. Adjustments by replacement and withdrawal will be made likewise in the battle line of the other nations that are parties to the agreement. But why do the United States and Great Britain require 15 capital ships each, and why Japan 9? Why not 10 each for the United States and Great Britain and 6 for Japan, and corresponding ratios for other nations?

The replacement cost of one battleship to-day is something like $40,000,000. It requires but a little calculation to determine the possibilities in reduction costs to all nations by applying the principle to this and other types. May we not move somewhat in this direction? A horizontal reduction of 33⅓ per cent would cut off approximately $100,000,000 from the annual budgets of Great Britain and the United States.

THE REPLACEMENT HUMP

Consider another factor that should challenge at once the great powers who are parties to the Washington treaty. Under present plans on account of the age of ships the entire replacement program for battleships of the United States, save alone the Colorado and the West Virginia, will occur within a period of 10 years, or from 1931 to 1941. The Colorado and West Virginia would follow two years later. As great a turnover must be met within the same period by Great Britain and Japan. This factor should drive home the thought of extension of life of capital ships and the lessening of numbers to the end that the annual naval budget may be reduced.

During the working out of such programs, allowances and adjustments would need to be made on account of certain differences in speed and tonnage of individual ships, and range and caliber of guns.

RELATED FACTORS

The lessening of the burdens of naval programs is not limited by money costs to ships. In it will be found reductions in man power, reductions in fuel, reductions in shore stations, reductions in repair and replacements.

MODERATION IN SHIPS IN COMMISSION

Finally, then, the United States to-day has upon her list of ships, including those available for shore duty, more than 600, and of this number we are providing in this bill that 318 shall be in commission in 1929.

I remember reading in a volume entitled "Nations and Navies," from the pen of the brilliant British naval writer, Hector C. Bywater, a statement to the effect that the battleships of Great Britain are to-day more powerful than all the battleships of the rest of Europe combined, and what he said as to battleships is true also of British cruisers; and what he says as applied to types of ships of Great Britain is true of the United States and Europe, exclusive of Great Britain, and what he said as being true there is true also of the ratio of strength of the United States with relation to the navies of North and South America, exclusive of our own country, and likewise it is true of Asia. What I have said is patent and yet why not remind ourselves now and then of just such truths?

When we think of the question from this point of view is it not apparent that if among the great powers of the world which to-day are strong upon the sea understandings can be worked out that will reduce naval armaments it will mean for world peace and it will mean for a reduction of naval budgets as well?

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has made a very interesting and instructive speech. The gentleman spoke about the obsolescence of vessels in 20 years. Is that because they figure the ships are antiquated because they do not have on them the latest improvements or is it a fact that the ships are still seaworthy?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, in the largest part, I would say it is because of improvements in design, propulsion power, guns, and the other factors which enter into making a ship effective as a military ship.

Mr. CRISP. That is what I had always understood, but I wanted to get the gentleman's view.

Mr. FRENCH. That is correct.

Mr. CRISP. In view of the gentleman's statement about extending the life of a ship for 25 years.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, a ship is as seaworthy after 30 years as she is at 20 years?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, yes. That is true of hulls. Engines and machinery must be replaced. It is an interesting thing in that connection to notice that many of the ships which are plying the seas to-day are ships that have been upon the registers for many, many more years than 20.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman let us know how many destroyers will be in commission next year and how many submarines?

Mr. FRENCH. We plan 103 destroyers; of the first line, 46 submarines; of the second line, 29; and fleet submarines, 5.

Then there is another factor in which we are always interested. Navies are not limited to shore establishments, ships, and fuel; they include officers and enlisted personnel. As the members of your committe have met officers and enlisted personnel, not only of the Navy but of the Marine Corps, it is the universal testimony of all, if you ask an officer, that the enlisted personnel is superb; that it is made up of the fine type of men whom we ought to have to make up the enlisted personnel of the United States Navy; and if you ask the enlisted personnel who the best officer is, he will tell you, "My commander," "My captain," "My officer." That is the spirit which has meant success for the American Navy. It is the spirit that characterizes the American Navy to-day; and it is the spirit that from the days of John Paul Jones down to the present hour has enabled the American Navy to reflect glory and honor upon not only the Naval Establishment but upon our country, as we have stood during a hundred and fifty years for definite ideals in the interest of humankind. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Could the gentleman add to his very interesting speech an estimate or statement of the total amount the Government has invested in the fleet we now have?

Mr. FRENCH. In the ships—the floating establishment—it would be approximately $1,200,000,000; and in shore stations, as I recall the figures, somewhere around $650,000,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in case we do not make an adjustment before the next peace conference in 1931 he contemplates that in the next 10 years we might have to replace the entire fleet?

Mr. FRENCH. I will say to my colleague that if he will examine the treaty adopted in 1923, in which a replacement program is worked out, he will find it means that every battleship of the United States Fleet may be replaced, except the West Virginia and Colorado alone, between the years 1931 and 1941. The West Virginia and Colorado would follow along two years later.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And it would take something like $1,000,000,000 to make that replacement?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, of course, we must bear in mind that when 1934 shall be reached, instead of 18 battleships we may prefer to have 15 battleships of larger tonnage than the present. If you take 2 from 15, that would leave 13, and the 13 must be replaced unless some modification shall occur within the 10 years, and the other 2 would follow on in the next 2 years.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand, the bill will provide for the appointment of four cadets to Annapolis?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. When are the extra appointments to be made?

Mr. FRENCH. They would follow on this year, although I take it, coming so late, probably not more than one-half of those nominated would enter, but the law would become effective at once.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit one other observation?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER I followed the figures which the gentleman gave as to the probable cost of the Navy for six or seven years in his very interesting speech a week ago, and I made a computation showing that it was going to cost us something like $2,200,000,000, but according to the gentleman's present statement the entire replacement of the fleet would be something like $1,200,000,000, so how is it we will spend in the half of 10 years something like twice as much as the entire cost of the fleet? Is that a fair statement of what the gentleman's figures show?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, I think the gentleman will remember this: That when I spoke on Friday I covered merely the period of time within which the program that was proposed then would last. I stated I thought that would have all been completed in 1935 and I did not go beyond 1935 except as to ships begun.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Then the gentleman's figures did show that in all probability in the next six years we will spend twice as much as the entire fleet is worth. Is that right?

Mr. FRENCH. I did not mean to say anything a moment ago that would bear out such an inference. Possibly the gentleman referred to my remarks upon cost of maintenance as well as replacement.

In response to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin I indicated a figure somewhat in excess of $2,700,000,000. This figure included operation and maintenance, and we must remember that operation and maintenance items make up, in round figures, between $280,000,000 or $290,000,000 of the present bill, and they will make up, unless we arrange some program of reduction, as large a part of any bill that will be presented for the support of the Navy during many years to come.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The point I wanted to bring out, and the one upon which the gentleman is conveying information to us, is that the cost of maintenance of the Navy, as we go on, is even more than the value of the Navy at any certain date.

Mr. FRENCH. The cost of maintenance of the Navy every year, including even substantial repair and overhaul, is practically equal to four times the average replacement cost when we think of replacement as meaning new ships.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the point I wanted to bring out.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. SEGER. In connection with the gentleman's statement about adding an extra assignment of candidates to the Naval Academy, has the gentleman given any thought to extending the period which is mandatory for his remaining in the service after he has been graduated?

Mr. FRENCH. I think that is a question that can probably be better handled by the administration. Personally, I think a midshipman owes it to the country and to the establishment from which he has graduated and to the service in which he has enrolled to serve for a reasonable time after graduation.

Mr. SEGER. The period at this time is two years.

Mr. FRENCH. Generally speaking, that is policy rather than law.

Mr. SEGER. I agree with the gentleman, because I believe that after a graduate has received four years of technical training as an engineer he ought to give more time than two years to the service of the Government.

Mr. FRENCH. Then there is another point in this same connection. Men who have urged four midshipmen or more for the Academy premise their argument largely upon the fact that these young men will flow back into our civilian life and will be ready to be called upon for service. I submit that a graduate of the Naval Academy, notwithstanding the fact that upon graduation he has a fine education and basic training for the Navy, after all is not very well fitted for naval service unless he shall have added to his work at the Academy several years' experience upon ships.

Mr. SEGER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to discuss some features of the great flood which swept the Mississippi Valley in April and May of last year and emphasize the extent of the damages suffered by the destructive flood waters of the tributaries of the Mississippi and indicate something of the need of flood control on these streams.

NATIONAL PROBLEM

Much has been said since that great flood of the national aspect of any flood-control project proposed for the Mississippi River Valley. Control of destructive flood waters in the Mississippi River Valley is no more a national question to-day than it has been in the past. For the purpose of navigation flood control has been recognized as a national problem based principally upon its effect on commerce and national defense, and the Government has for years made contributions to this end. So flood control has been recognized as a national problem, although it has been treated by the Government as incidental to navigation.

The destructive floods which swept down the Mississippi Valley, taking great toll of life and property, is within itself a national question which should engage the attention of the Government as such. In order for it to come within the generally accepted term of "a national problem" there must be found in the Constitution provisions for expending money from the Federal Treasury to encompass the purpose of flood control. It is not my purpose to go into a lengthy or detailed discussion of the authorities provided in the Constitution for such expenditures but rather to mention them and pass them up without comment. Article I, section 8 of the Constitution provides that—

> Congress shall have powers * * * to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States * * * to regulate commerce, and to establish post offices and post roads.

Under any one or all of these provisions of the Constitution is provided ample authority for the Government to provide money for the control of destructive flood waters upon any stream where conditions are of such proportions as to justify.

The Jones bill, which is now before the Senate, and the Reid bill, which has been considered by the House committee, recognize these clauses in the Constitution as sufficient authority for the expenditure of money for flood control in certain parts of the Mississippi River Valley. These bills are based upon the fundamental proposition that if commerce is interrupted, postal facilities impaired, and our national defense and general welfare are threatened and imperiled, the National Treasury may be looked to as a source for relief. The Jones bill particularly makes the source from which the relief is to be obtained national. But the scope of the relief afforded is very local, indeed. For this reason it is my purpose to make an appeal for flood protection on the tributaries. We are opening this fight and will prosecute it diligently to secure tributary relief.

I do not contend that the Government should go out upon every remote stream which every now and then has some freshet which causes damages of more or less proportion and expend money for the control of its flood. But it is my contention that when destructive flood waters completely paralyze commerce, imperil our national defense, stop the transmission of our mails, and drive multiplied thousands of people from their homes and exact a great toll of human lives, all combine to approach a calamity of such proportions that no civilized government with a constitution such as ours can afford to ignore it. Of course, the participation of the Government in bringing relief to any stricken State or community would depend altogether upon how seriously any one of these constitutional provisions was involved. The degree of this involvement should determine the participation of the Federal Government in the project.

ARKANSAS HEAVY LOSER

I propose to show by figures, from the most reliable source, that in the flood of 1927 Arkansas was, perhaps, more seriously damaged than any other State. I propose to show by figures from the same source that 88 per cent of the damage done in Arkansas was done by waters independent of and uninfluenced by the Mississippi River. And yet the Jones bill does not propose to relieve this situation in any degree. You might carry out the full purport of the Jones bill and a flood of the exact nature of 1927 would not have its horrors decreased 20 per cent. I say this with all due respect to the powerful committee from which that bill emerged. But as a relief from floods such as we had in 1927, so far as Arkansas is concerned, the Jones bill would be a monstrous failure.

In emphasizing the flood damages on the tributaries, I would not like to see these facts draw the thoughtful consideration of Congress away from the devastations of the lower Mississippi River. But to make clear that the lower Mississippi River was not the only river which devastated great areas and that a popular flood-control plan must revolve around one project common to both the Mississippi and its tributaries. I shall discuss this last thought later. In order for you to get the proper conception of the magnitude of the flood on the tributaries it is necessary to draw some comparison. For this purpose, I recently called upon the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture to furnish me with such figures as they could with regard to the damages suffered in Missouri, Kentucky, Illinois, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas. I found the only data they had was that furnished by county agents, and it only referred to livestock figures and the amount of crop land inundated and the date at which this inundated territory might be free of water. While this omits all items of damages, except as relates to livestock, yet it affords an authentic yardstick by which we may measure the comparative damages suffered in the different States. Since Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi suffered greater damages than any of the rest, I shall only use the figures that apply to these three States.

State	Horses and mules	Cattle	Swine	Poultry	Crop land inundated
					Acres
Mississippi	7,375	9,000	22,690	263,300	861,900
Louisiana	7,100	19,580	55,930	487,830	1,105,200
Arkansas	9,250	21,060	66,590	525,440	1,839,400

According to these figures it will be observed that Arkansas had practically a million acres more of crop land inundated than in the State of Mississippi, and practically 725,000 acres more than in the State of Louisiana. It will also be observed that Arkansas had a greater loss in horses and mules, cattle, swine, and poultry than either of the other two States. As stated before, my only purpose in this comparison is to emphasize the tremendous flood damages suffered in Arkansas on the tributary streams.

ARKANSAS FLOOD DAMAGES

Arkansas has more miles of navigable river streams than any other State in the Union. I mean by this, miles of navigable waterways as recognized by the Government as such. The tributary streams of the Mississippi River which flow through Arkansas are the Arkansas River, White River, Red River, St. Francis River, and the Ouachita River. I shall not take the time to go into the details on any of these rivers except the Arkansas, in the valley of which I have lived all my life, and have seen every foot of river from where it rises on the continental divide to where it flows some 1,400 miles distance therefrom into the Mississippi River.

Using data from the same source and in the same tabulated form, which I have applied to the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, I now submit figures dealing with the damages upon the tributaries of the Mississippi affecting the State of Arkansas. I have taken the Bureau of Agricultural Economics report on each county in Arkansas and combined this with the other counties which form the tributary basins as nearly as it was possible to do:

River	Horses and mules	Cattle	Swine	Poultry	Crop land inundated
					Acres
Arkansas	5,450	11,460	24,220	279,870	910,000
White	1,660	4,610	23,080	121,496	329,000
St. Francis	570	810	5,100	19,660	223,900
Ouachita	570	2,800	5,410	9,040	91,700
Red		90	40	12,000	32,000
Total	8,250	19,770	57,850	442,066	1,586,600

It is difficult to estimate the amount of damages done by the Mississippi River in Arkansas. The levees of the Mississippi River in Arkansas remained intact except for two or three minor breaks. The White River to a small degree and the St. Francis were influenced by backwaters from the Mississippi and the St. Francis received an additional volume of water from the break of the Mississippi Levee in Missouri at the Dorena break. However, my information is that this water was small in comparison to the water which came down the natural drainage basin of the St. Francis River. While the St. Francis River affects Mississippi, Phillips, and Crittenden Counties, I have given the damage to these counties as resulting alone from the waters of the Mississippi River. These areas and some 20,000 other acres accounts for all of the territory flooded in the State of Arkansas by the Mississippi River in the flood of 1927. This important fact should not be forgotten that 88 per cent of the damages as assigned by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics as a result of floods of 1927 in the State of Arkansas came from the water of the tributary streams of the Mississippi. With these astounding facts confronting them, there are those who would to-day go into the Federal Treasury to get money to protect this 12 per cent and totally ignore the other 88 per cent of territory in the State of Arkansas.

DAMAGES ON THE ARKANSAS RIVER

In order to impress upon you the magnitude of the flood suffering from the waters of the Arkansas River in the State of Arkansas, I herewith submit Table No. 3, which compares the damages suffered by the people along that stream with the damages suffered in the entire State of Mississippi:

States	Horses and mules	Cattle	Swine	Poultry	Crop land inundated
					Acres
Entire State of Mississippi	7,375	9,000	22,690	263,300	861,900
Arkansas by Arkansas River alone	5,450	11,460	24,220	297,870	910,100

This total shows that the Arkansas River did more damages on every item furnished by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics except the one item of horses and mules. It discloses that the Arkansas River flooded more crop land by over 150,000 acres than was overflowed in the entire State of Mississippi; and yet flood relief on the Arkansas is practically ignored, both in the Jones bill and under the Jadwin plan. Can it be possible that Congress represents the sentiment of the American people in the matter of the control of destructive waters by eliminating such a problem as this from their consideration? I shall deal in logical order with damages done by the Arkansas River later on.

In giving information as to the damages suffered by the inhabitants along the basin of the Arkansas River it is necessary to give you something as to the amount of rainfall and the volume of water it carried and the carrying capacity of the Arkansas River.

1927 RAINFALL AND CHARACTER OF VALLEY

The rainfall which caused our great flood fell from a point beginning west of Tulsa, Okla., in southeast Kansas and southern Missouri and in northern and western Arkansas. At Tulsa the rainfall was 6 or 8 inches, which fell in a period between April 7 and April 20. A slightly increased rainfall characterized the southeast Kansas and southern Missouri, growing in intensity along the Arkansas Basin until it reached 14 inches at Fort Gibson, Okla.; the same at Fort Smith, Ark.; 16 inches at Fayetteville, Ark.; 16 inches at Jasper, Ark.; and 19 inches at Danville, Ark.; tapering down to 9 inches at Little Rock. Most of this water fell in a short period of three or four days.

Mr. HARDY. In what length of time was that 14 inches of rainfall?

Mr. RAGON. The rain fell in the period between the 7th of April and the 20th of April, but most of it fell in two or three days; practically all of it fell in two or three days.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Were there any cities inundated between Pine Bluff and Fort Smith?

Mr. RAGON. Yes; but I can not tell you about that. I know in my district the flood got up into a part of Little Rock and North Little Rock.

Mr. ARENTZ. Because of the settlers along this river from east to west storage would be impossible within the confines of the State of Arkansas, would it not?

Mr. RAGON. I rather think so. In the proper place I will take that up.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Can the gentleman give any idea of the fall between Fort Smith and Pine Bluff?

Mr. RAGON. I have those figures, but they are not in my mind at present.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What are the power possibilities of the Arkansas River between Pine Bluff and Fort Smith in connection with the development of such work as might be done to control the flood? Would it be possible to generate power?

Mr. RAGON. Yes; and I will deal with that later on.

The Arkansas River, as I have stated before, rises in Colorado and flows in a southeastern direction through Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Arkansas into the Mississippi River. Its main tributaries are the North and South Canadian Rivers, the Cimmarron River, the Verdigris River, and the Neosho or Grand River. All of these rivers flow into the Arkansas in the State of Oklahoma, the Neosho and Verdigris rising in Kansas and the Cimmarron and South Canadian rising in New Mexico and flowing through Texas and Oklahoma. All of these tributaries except the Canadian flow into the Arkansas above Fort Gibson, Okla. There are other small tributaries, but they do not contribute very much to our damaging floods.

Mr. GARBER. Has the gentleman an estimate of the damages in Oklahoma caused by the tributaries?

Mr. RAGON. Yes. In Oklahoma the estimated damage done in 1927 by the Arkansas River and tributaries is in excess of $20,000,000. In other words, the overflow about which there has been so much talk in the lower Mississippi took a toll in Kansas of $12,000,000, while here in Oklahoma the damage was $20,000,000 before it even reached the State of Arkansas.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman is making a very instructive statement, one that the House ought to have. I want to ask if there was any loss of life on the Arkansas River and its tributaries?

Mr. RAGON. Yes. I will say to my friend that I have not figured out the loss on the different tributaries, but I feel confident in saying that 80 per cent of the loss in Arkansas was by these tributaries alone.

The Arkansas River Valley, which in Arkansas extends from Fort Smith to Pine Bluff, I believe suffered more permanent and irreparable damage than any other section in all the flooded area in 1927. This valley is approximately 200 miles long and varies in width from 5 to 20 miles. It has 11 cities ranging in population from 3,000 to 100,000, Little Rock, the capital of the State, being the largest. In this valley there is as fertile land as there is within the State, owned principally in small tracts by farmers who in years past might have been termed as prosperous. This valley is largely adapted to cotton, corn, and alfalfa.

According to the United States Army engineers, the low water flow of the Arkansas River at the gauge at Little Rock, which is about 175 miles from the mouth of the Arkansas, is 1,100 cubic feet per second. The bank-full flow of the river at this same point is 370,000 cubic feet per second. On April 21 there passed by this gauge the unprecedented volume of approximately 875,000 cubic feet per second. At the same time there passed the gauge at Clarendon, Ark., on the White River, over 400,000 cubic feet of water per second through a channel, the bank-full capacity of which is only 40,000 cubic feet per second. Hence it will be seen that the combined flow of the Arkansas and White Rivers was 1,200,000 cubic feet per second of water. It is an interesting comparison to note that the flow of the Mississippi River below the mouth of the Arkansas was only slightly above 2,000,000 feet. In other words the Arkansas and White Rivers alone carried practically 60 per cent of the peak volume of waters of the Mississippi River at its highest stage.

ENTIRE ARKANSAS RIVER BASIN DAMAGES

This great volume of water congregated from Oklahoma, southeast Kansas and southwest Missouri converged into a volume of water which passed Fort Smith, Ark., a distance of 165 miles northwest of Little Rock, with a registered flow of 750,000 cubic feet per second. Before the House Flood Control Committee it was estimated that the damages done to Kansas on the tributaries of the Arkansas was approximately $12,000,000. The engineers from the State flood commission of Oklahoma estimates the damage done in 1927 by the Arkansas and its tributaries in Oklahoma to be in excess of $20,000,000. Anticipating that it would be of some interest to Congress to know the actual damages suffered in the Arkansas portion of the Arkansas River Valley, I called upon prominent business men and farmers to get together in each county from Fort Smith to Little Rock and compile figures of the damages suffered in each county. They did so, basing their estimates upon the value of the real estate prior and subsequent to the flood; damages to buildings and contents; crop losses; damage to bridges and highways and levees. As a result of these conferences the damages in each county were given to me as follows: Beginning at Fort Smith, in Sebastian County, there was a damage of $335,000; in Crawford County, $2,750,000; Franklin County, $1,025,000; Logan County, $343,000; Johnson County, $2,142,560; Pope County, $3,800,500; Yell County, $3,870,000; Conway County, $3,450,000; Faulkner County, $1,070,102; Pulaski County, $2,627,000. I did not go to Jefferson and Lonoke Counties, but I wired a friend who was the former mayor of Little Rock and now connected with the chamber of commerce at Pine Bluff, and in reply he wired me the damages to Jefferson County were $4,500,000. The amount of damages suffered in Lonoke County I procured from the Red Cross, which estimated that Lonoke County suffered $261,150 damages. From the same source I procured the damages to Perry County, which were estimated as $31,970, making a total loss in this valley of 200 miles distance of $26,206,532. These figures do not cover an area any closer to the mouth of the Arkansas River than 100 miles. Neither do they cover the great area overflowed by the Arkansas River in Desha, Drew, Chicot, and Ashley Counties. Also they do not include livestock loss.

The fall in the Arkansas River from Fort Smith to Pine Bluff is rather marked, but at Pine Bluff the fall from there to the mouth of the Arkansas is very slight. For this reason, while damages to real estate in counties in southeast Arkansas was very great, it is not so heavy as those counties in the Arkansas Valley. The figures I have given as to the damages in the Arkansas Valley, and the livestock losses heretofore enumerated, do not cover all the items of damages, for I have not an estimate at hand of the damages done to railroads, telegraph companies, coal mines, and other industries. But, adding to the $32,000,000 of damages suffered in Oklahoma and Kansas, the $26,000,000 of known damages done in the Arkansas River Valley in Arkansas alone is sufficient to show that over $58,000,000 of damages was suffered on the Arkansas River from Pine Bluff north and west. I dare say if the facts could be ascertained that no less than $80,000,000 in damages was suffered on the Arkansas River last April.

Through this Arkansas River Valley there runs two great railway lines. One on the north side of the Arkansas River being one of the main lines of the Missouri Pacific, which runs from Kansas City to New Orleans. On the south side of the river runs the Rock Island, from Amarillo, Tex., to Memphis. There are two telegraph lines on either side of the river and main lines of telephone companies. This valley is the most thickly populated of any section in the State.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And who does the gentleman suggest should pay all this damage that he has referred to?

Mr. RAGON. If the gentleman does not object, I shall be glad to treat that a little later.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman answer my question, if he will.

Mr. RAGON. Very well. I can answer it here readily. If the gentleman had been listening to me when I began my address——

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I was listening.

Mr. RAGON. He would have understood that I suggested this. If you are going to accept the logic of the Jones bill, or of the Reid bill, you must make this contribution from the National Treasury, based, as it must be, upon some provision of the Constitution. There must be some postal facility threatened, there must be some commerce interrupted, there must be human lives taken, and combining all, or taking any one of them, you have justification for a contribution upon the part of the Federal Government. How far will you go upon it is the question, and I am not prepared to answer. I do say this, that where your commerce justifies it, where your national defense is impaired greatly, and where human lives are snuffed out, it then becomes a matter where the governmental participation should be heavy, but up here upon some of these streams where commerce is not so involved, where the national defense is not so imperiled, and where the loss of life is not so great or so often, the loss there involving the Government would be to a very much less extent. My contention is that it depends upon the degree of involvement of these things, upon which we base this constitutional aid, in respect to these different tributaries.

Mr. MADDEN. And it would take some time to ascertain that, I take it?

Mr. RAGON. Yes. There is no other way to do it, if you are going to treat this matter in a comprehensive way, and that is the only way to treat it. If you treat the matter as it should be treated, then it is going to take some time, and we have to abide with patience.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. The gentleman suggested and it is quite true that neither the Jones bill nor the Jadwin plan take care of the tributaries. Has any plan been submitted that does take care of the tributaries?

Mr. RAGON. We have several, yes, that have been submitted, and I think the Senate is going to adopt them.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. What plan, for instance, provides relief for the tributaries?

Mr. RAGON. That would take me into a discussion here that I would not like now to enter.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman can say the reservoir system.

Mr. RAGON. I shall deal with that later, and that is the reason that I hesitated answering the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman again to ask a question?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I was interested to know in your computation as to the damage on this river, what percentage of the amount involves the destruction of crops for that year, and what percentage of it is land that they were able to till and raise a crop on during that year?

Mr. RAGON. They based the crop loss on the actual loss, whatever it was in a county.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And I take it that that was the principal loss; that is, the crop loss?

Mr. RAGON. Oh, no; it was the damage to the washed real estate and the sanded real estate. I am acquainted with every foot of this, because practically all of it runs through my district. I would not give you 50 cents on the dollar for any acre in the Arkansas Valley since 1927, compared to what it was worth before. Men who know—farmers, business men, professional men, men of sound judgment, interested in Arkansas, I know sat around the table, 10 of them, in my county, and I sat with them and listened to them as they computed these damages. The damage to real estate alone in my county which is one of the smallest in the State, was over a million dollars.

During the flood times I was in my home town of Clarksville, Ark., which is in the foothills of the Ozark Mountains and 3 miles from the Arkansas River. For a period of practically 10 days, save and except for radio communications and occasionally when the telegraph and telephones were operating, we were completely shut off from the outside world. The only mail we received for practically 10 days was brought in by one or two airplane visits. For a week we did not receive a daily paper from our capital city, only 100 miles away. All lines of industry were as completely paralyzed as if they did not exist. I recall that the first mail which came to us by train was pulled through water almost up to the fire box of the engine. The conditions existing in my little city were characteristic of conditions throughout the Arkansas River Valley.

When the flood subsided it was discovered that in this beautiful and fertile little valley this devastating flood had cut and sanded splendid farms to such an extent that they were worthless the rest of the year and permanently and irreparably injured from 25 per cent to 75 per cent of their value. I have never seen such devastation as that flood worked to the counties of my own district. It drove over 12,000 people from their homes, 30 per cent of whom never returned, because their homes were wrecked and destroyed. Seventeen people lost their lives as a result of the floods in the Arkansas River Valley. All of this property was destroyed; all these people were driven from their homes, and all of these people were drowned in a section for which the Jadwin plan or the Jones bill makes no provisions whatever.

ARKANSAS RIVER ONCE CONTROLLED

There was a time when the Army engineers had an office at Little Rock and kept an engineer there who had charge of some of the tributary streams of the Mississippi in that State. Some years ago he was removed for reasons of which I do not know. But I do know that there was a time easily within my memory when the Arkansas River was navigable and steamboats plied their way loaded with merchandise as far up the river as Fort Smith. The river, however, has been permitted to fill within recent years until it is no longer navigable for large boats. This flood of 1927 swept every levee in the Arkansas River Valley before it. It cut down banks and carved new channels as effectively as one might make with a gigantic steam shovel. The result is now that the farmers of the Arkansas River Valley find their lands left to the ravages of an overflow by every bank-full rise of the Arkansas River. Unable in most instances, because of financial conditions, to help themselves, they find the back of the hand of their Government turned to them, notwithstanding they can not drive a pile into the river, build a bridge across it, nor put a ferryboat upon it without first having the consent of this great and beneficent Government.

CONSTITUTIONAL REQUIREMENTS MET

All of these facts and figures contribute unmistakably, it seems to me, to bring the Arkansas River within the protecting care of those provisions of the Constitution upon which the Jones bill and the Reid bill are hypothecated. Can an economic wastage of $75,000,000 in a single year in a section not 500 miles long occur and this section be denied the protection which is given it under the commerce clause of the Constitution? Can thousands of homes and a score of lives be lost and this section not be given the protection of the general-welfare clause of the Constitution? When the mails for a period of one week, from Kansas City and Oklahoma City to Little Rock, Shreveport, and Alexandria, La., were completely tied up for a period of a week, can this section be denied the protection of the clause of the Constitution for postal facilities? Camp Pike was one of the cantonments that housed as high as 80,000 soldiers. It is located at Little Rock. Fort Logan H. Roots, used as an officers' training school, is also at Little Rock. Camp Beauregard, in Louisiana, was another place where thousands of soldiers were mobilized. Had this flood occurred during the war period the mobilization of soldiers and their dispatch to different quarters would have been completely tied up from 1 week to 15 days. With this and other features of our national defense entering into the situation, can it be said that we should not invoke the national-defense clause of the Constitution in the prevention of such calamities? If we are going to spend hundreds of millions of dollars for the protection of commerce, saving of human lives, the strengthening of our national defense, and to better our postal facilities from Cairo, Ill., to the mouth of the Mississippi River, who would not give commerce, human life, and the national defense and postal facilities the same consideration in other places where a like disaster has occurred? To say that this Government shall expend hundreds of millions of dollars which would provide a plan, if such can be done, for carrying of flood waters from Cairo to the mouth of the Mississippi River and ignoring all other sections is an assertion not founded on reasonable application of the provisions of the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for an additional 15 minutes.

IT IS ALL ONE PROJECT

Mr. RAGON. I have studied carefully the testimony of engineers, both in Army and civil life, and am fairly familiar with the entire Mississippi River Valley. How any flood-control plan can be evolved which is successful without incorporating the entire Mississippi Valley from Montana to Pittsburgh and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf is beyond my comprehension. If one will but look at the map, he will see the great Louisiana Territory from the Mississippi back to the Rocky Mountains has a perfect natural drainage. East of the Mississippi he will see the great States of Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, West Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Tennessee have a natural drainage, principally through the Ohio River, a tributary of the Mississippi. It is not my purpose to deal with flood stages on the other rivers, but it will be well to remember that what happened on the Arkansas River and the White River may at any time happen on the Missouri, the upper Mississippi, or the Ohio River. If it had not been for the Arkansas and White River flood, the 1927 flood would not have received a headline on a single newspaper in the United States.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. What reason is there for discrimination against your section? If there is any reason at all for granting relief, it seems to me from the arguments you have advanced and the statements you make that equal relief ought to be granted to those people living along the Arkansas River. I do not know of any reason, and I wonder if there is any that has any justice or common sense in it.

Mr. RAGON. The same reason that permits the floods to rush down the Ohio River every year, exacting millions of dollars in damages to those people—the same reason that permits the water every year to rush down the Missouri River—is the reason that applies to the Arkansas River. The Government turns its back to the Arkansas River. It should not be.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I think if gentlemen in the House would listen to your eloquent speech they would give you more encouragement than they have shown heretofore.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is not a question of paying for damages you have suffered, but you are asking for money to be expended in the future?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. You are not asking for reimbursement for money values that were lost?

Mr. RAGON. No. Let me give you a picture. I was called to the little city of Dardanelle, in a bottom, embracing 55,000 acres, one of the richest pieces of land in the United States. I was taken to an 80-acre farm there that had been bought and paid for by the owner, he paying $225 per acre for that land. He spent the savings of a lifetime to purchase it. There was a hole through that land that had been made there in the Arkansas River bank that was as deep as this Chamber, and it extended the entire distance of that fellow's 80 acres of land, and left that whole 55,000-acre tract open to the ravages of the Arkansas River.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. I have been very much interested in what the gentleman says about the overflow in his section of country, but what I am particularly interested in is in knowing what form of relief the gentleman recommends to Congress.

Mr. RAGON. I shall get to that shortly.

It seems to me the Mississippi River and its tributaries should be considered as one project, and that its development should be under one administrative unit.

The annual economic wastage by reasons of floods on all of these great tributaries of the Mississippi would more than pay for the most complete flood-control project conceivable within a period of 20 years. Look at these States with their agricultural and industrial wealth. Look at your income-tax returns and see what these States are contributing to the National Treasury each year. One of these great tributaries plows its way through a section which has been aptly termed the "World's great bread basket." Therefore it seems to me that the Mississippi River and its tributaries should be considered as one project and that its development should be under one administrative unit. If the genius of our engineers can provide a means of controlling flood waters of the tributaries, then is it not common horse sense that this control would greatly influence the flood of the lower Mississippi? If this is true, why then pass a flood relief bill which calls for expenditure of more than one-fourth of a billion dollars which only handles the flood waters from Cairo to the Gulf. In treating the Mississippi and its tributaries as one project, it seems to me that it will solve two difficult problems: First, you relieve the distress of those living in the tributary basin, and second, you make less expensive the control works on the lower Mississippi.

In other words, if you can go on the Missouri River and control it, and go on the upper Mississippi and on the Ohio and upon the Arkansas, how in the name of common reason can anyone say that the local control of those floods will not restrain the floods on the lower Mississippi River?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman is aware of the fact that Congress has authorized a study of the Mississippi and its tributary streams with a view of controlling navigation and controlling the floods upon them. That work will begin in a few days, as I understand it, because Congress only recently appropriated the money, $2,000,000 of which is to be applied to that work at once. I am wondering if that work is not, after all, what the gentleman will need on the Arkansas River as one of the tributaries of the Mississippi. Does the gentleman want immediate relief rather than wait for such a study of that stream?

Mr. RAGON. If there is no immediate relief, there will not be anything left there to relieve. The gentleman has asked a very pertinent question. The engineers tell me that under the projects incorporated in the river and harbor bill last year, and for which we made appropriations to carry them out at this session, it will take, perhaps, 10 years to complete some of that program. If you are going to take that length of time on the Arkansas River, then you will feed us to the wolves; we have nothing left.

I want to compliment the gentleman and his committee on the forward step which they have taken. But as for flood control, it does not serve the purpose.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want to say to the gentleman that I think in the case he has made out here to-day it might be proper for the engineers to prefer the Arkansas River, to devote their time and attention to that program and speed it up, as to the development of the stream and all its uses as a whole. We might be able in a short time to get a full and complete plan for this river for the control of floods, the development of navigation, and power if there be power possibilities.

Mr. RAGON. Our complaint, I might add here, is this: If you permit them to go down to Cairo, Ill., and build great flood works, with diversion channels in the State of Arkansas and State of Louisiana, which will take for flood-way purposes almost as much territory as is now flooded, you are putting something there that the Government will be slow to abandon; and they will accept that kind of a ramshackle flood-control plan in preference to going up these streams and protecting them as they should be protected.

I think what ought to be done is that the project for the lower Mississippi ought to be interlocked with all of these tributaries and all considered as one project under one administrative unit.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit another inquiry?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We are getting a great deal of information from the gentleman's speech. Has the gentleman made any estimate as to how much water we would have to hold back on these tributaries?

Mr. RAGON. I am coming to that right now.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In order to render the losses on the lower Mississippi negligible?

Mr. RAGON. I come to that right now, and I quote nothing but figures from the Army engineers in substantiation of what I say.

FLOOD PLAN

It is quite popular in this day for everyone to have his pet flood-control plan, and I may appear novel in not having any plan. I think our engineers should be told to go and prepare plans and then should be given the money to carry them out. I know, if supplied with money, the engineers could relieve largely the awful catastrophe which occurred in the Arkansas River Valley. In some places levees, dredging, and revetment might be employed to aid those exposed to the floods. Again, I am of the firm opinion that reservoirs may be effectively employed in holding back headwaters of the tributaries. I will call no names, but I have been advised by what should be the highest engineering authority in the United States that reservoirs on the tributaries could be used successfully in the prevention of local floods on the tributaries. If this is true, how can it be reasoned that this would not influence the volume of waters in the lower Mississippi? I have before referred to the fact that 815,000 cubic feet per second was gauged at Little Rock in April, 1927. The gauge at Fort Smith showed in the same flood that 740,000 second feet passed down the Arkansas River at that place. Little Rock is approximately 200 miles from the mouth of the Arkansas River and Fort Smith is 165 miles northwest of Little Rock, and we find that the difference in the flood waters at Little Rock and Fort Smith was approximately 75,000 cubic feet per second. Eminent engineers have surveyed out reservoirs in the State of Oklahoma, which they contend would easily take care of the surplus amount of this water. Within 150 miles of Fort Smith is the location of one of these proposed reservoir sites. If these reservoirs could have been employed in keeping back 400,000 cubic feet per second of the water that passed Fort Smith, the Arkansas River Valley and the other sections of the Arkansas overflowed by the Arkansas River would have been entirely prevented. If this can be done on the Arkansas and the White River, why can it not be done on other tributaries?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that 10 minutes would give the gentleman more than one hour. Is there objection to the gentleman from Arkansas proceeding for another 10 minutes, making the total of time allotted to him 1 hour and 5 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGON. With these facts in mind, gentleman, that you can retain back here in the State of Oklahoma more than one-half of the entire flood waters that passed Fort Smith, and then to say that will have no influence whatever upon the flow of the Mississippi River, which is 365 miles from Fort Smith, and the flow of which loses only 75,000 cubic feet per second as it traverses that distance, is to say something that sounds absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman know that the estimates of the engineers who figured out the program for those reservoirs are that it will only cost $21,000,000 to hold back that water by building those reservoirs?

Mr. RAGON. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I had an engineer figure this up for me the other night, and that gentleman said he could hold back 500,000 cubic feet per second at an expenditure of only $19,000,000, and yet we are foreclosed, apparently, from any consideration whatever of this in the Jones bill or the Jardine plan.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that is in variance with the report of the engineers who are not in favor of reservoirs.

Mr. RAGON. That may be true.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How does the gentleman's idea with respect to his proposition compare with the conservancy dam on the Miami?

Mr. RAGON. I am not familiar with that dam, and I would not want to say.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. That has stood the test for several years.

Mr. RAGON. I understand it is very successful.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Would there be fall enough in those upper reaches to generate power when we create these reservoirs?

Mr. RAGON. Oh, yes. What is the height of Pike's Peak?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Fourteen thousand feet.

Mr. RAGON. It starts on the continental divide and it falls to almost sea level at the Mississippi, and about the only place it is practically level is from Pine Bluff to the mouth. I will say that from Muskogee, Okla., to Pine Bluff, Ark., there is not a wilder river of its size in the United States than the Arkansas River.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The gentleman is making one of the finest speeches I have ever heard on this question. A flood is caused by too much water being in the channel of a river, and if you take the water away and hold it in reservoirs you can not have a flood—is not that right?

Mr. RAGON. That is correct.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I think the gentleman's argument is practically unanswerable.

Mr. RAGON. I want to say frankly that I did not believe in reservoir control at first. I doubted it seriously until I began last summer's study of reservoir control, and I am saying to you frankly that if what the Army engineers say is correct, taking the physical facts that are always unerring and applying them to the advice of the Army engineers, you can not escape the conclusion that the larger part of the 1927 flood could have been absolutely solved by the construction and use of reservoirs. [Applause.]

It seems to me that a proper solution of the flood problems of the Mississippi Valley can only be brought about by Congress laying down a broad policy of flood control and river regulation and appropriating sufficient money to do emergency work on the lower Mississippi with direction to our engineers to begin at once a comprehensive survey of the entire Mississippi Valley, and then report back to Congress at the earliest practicable moment a project for its adoption. I am forced to the conclusion that any other action upon the part of Congress will prove "penny wise and pound foolish."

THE COST

I know that in the minds of many there revolves the question, Would not this cost too much money? While I would not advocate it, I think the Government would find it sound business in the long run to pay every penny of the expenses. There are sections where the Government can not well afford to exact contributions, while other sections might well afford it. We do not now realize the importance in the future of more navigable waterways in this country. This is because we do not need them at present. It seems to me the economic trend of transportation points to an ultimate freight rate which will be almost self-destructive. New modes of transportation have sprung up so suddenly and rapidly that our great railway systems have had to act carefully to avoid their demoralizing effects. It is not impossible that within the next 10 or 15 years there will be a revolution in the transportation facilities of this country. Then when you add to this an additional population of 50,000,000 of people, why should not the strong hand of the Government hold transportation charges to its people within reasonable bounds because of its ability to set in motion new commercial highways on our navigable rivers? No; it is not a dream; it is history evolving from the life and experience of other nations. If our rivers are neglected until that time, it means that their preparation will be doubly expensive. If the reservoir system will do what its proponents contend it will do, then it will solve the problem of navigation, not only on the tributaries, but on the lower Mississippi as well.

I can not estimate the cost, and I do not believe the engineers can estimate the cost of such a project, until they have had the opportunity to survey the valley in its entirety. And this has not been done. Congress should see to it that it is done before they embark upon some of the colossal schemes which have been proposed. Congress can not avoid the responsibility of saying what the policies shall be, and our engineers can not avoid the responsibility of carrying out that policy. We should not permit the engineers to dictate our policies nor to name the amount to be expended, and they should not presume to do so; the responsibility for a policy is ours and we should discharge it.

Representing a district that was cut to the heart by that flood, I do not propose to return to my people and say the lower Mississippi received all of the relief and that the Arkansas River received none, if I can possibly help it. To those Members in the basins of the upper Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Missouri, I would say that you stand in constant danger of the same devastating flood that was suffered by the basin of the Arkansas. In time this will come to you, and what account will you render to your people if you fail to give your efforts to bring about a comprehensive flood-control plan for this country? I do not want to be misunderstood as wanting to withhold relief from the lower Mississippi, but I do want to most emphatically record myself as supporting a comprehensive plan that will take care of floods in the Mississippi Valley everywhere the yardstick of a national problem can be applied, and I hope that every Member on the tributaries to the Mississippi will join the Members on the Arkansas River, from Colorado to the Mississippi, in demanding a comprehensive flood-control plan. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call the attention of the Congress of the United States to the unparalleled brutal treatment accorded to my coreligionists in a seemingly friendly country of Rumania. Many days ago I attended a mass meeting at Cooper Union in the city of New York, at which time I had the honor of addressing myself to a large assemblage of Americans, who were met to protest against anti-Semitism as practiced in Rumania. I was then requested to call the attention of our Congress to the existing situation. I am rising now to give expression to the feelings of our people.

About this time a year ago the assaults upon the Jews in Rumania made it necessary to hold a large mass meeting in the city of New York and to arrange similar protests in other communities. A delegation representing the American Jewish Congress and associate organizations went to Washington at that time and presented the facts with regard to the sad plight of the Rumanian Jewry to our Secretary of State. Other attempts were made to interest officials of our Government and leaders of public opinion in the matter. Action was also taken at that time tending to impress upon the Rumanian Government both the wrongs which were being committed against the Jews and the harm which is likely to come to Rumania herself from the pursuit of such a policy of oppression and failure to check anti-Semitic agitation. The charges which were then made and the facts which were presented to representatives of our Government have since been confirmed by non-Jewish and impartial sources of the highest standing. An investigation has been made on behalf of the American committee on the Rights of Religious Minorities made up of about 50 prominent Americans. Every charge was fully confirmed and there is no question but that the Rumanian Government had been guilty of the most atrocious conduct unfit for a civilized nation and crying to Heaven for redress. In spite of the protests and warnings that were given to Rumania at the time of the disturbances of last year, the riots and outrages were repeated in a number of cities in December, 1927. Nor has the House of Representatives been silent about this matter. Several of my colleagues saw fit to introduce resolutions on this subject. The conscience of the country has been aroused and it is up to this august body to see to it that public opinion thus stimulated result in a change of attitude in Rumania.

The conclusion of the late war left in its wake throughout central Europe a number of nations with Racial or Religious "Minorities," for which the treaty of peace promised equitable treatment. Rumania, let us be fair, is not the only culprit in central or eastern Europe. But Rumania can not plead the sense of defeat and humiliation which may be responsible for unrest or disturbances in countries like Hungary. Rumania came out of the war enormously augmented in area and population. Her duty, nay, her very self-interest should prompt her to consolidate what she had won. But the poorest conceivable way of cementing a new nation together is by intimidation and denial of legal and moral rights.

The Rumanian outrages can be summarized under the heads of destruction of Jewish life, destruction of Jewish property, and desecration of Jewish places of worship. The larger aspects of the Rumanian situation are discrimination against Jews in public office, in public institutions of learning, and other public manifestations of the anti-Semitic spirit. This latter portion of our grievances can hardly be ameliorated by action without the country. The problem of public persecution is too deep-seated and too broad to enable us to eradicate it by any action which we may take, but this Congress is able and should take action against destruction of Jewish life, destruction of Jewish property, and desecration of Jewish places of worship.

In this connection permit me to read from the preliminary report of the American committee on the Rights of Religious Minorities, as published in the New York Times of December 7, 1927:

The deputation is unanimous in feeling that the anti-Jewish propaganda, which has attracted special attention in Rumania, is part of a widespread and ugly manifestation of racial and religious hatred. Rumania is not the only offender, and while the commission deals with conditions in Rumania it feels that the anti-Semitic riots which have recently occurred in Hungary illustrate how widespread this deplorable hatred is.

Hungarian minorities within the borders of Rumania are entitled to the fullest measure of protection within the rights accorded them by the minorities treaties, but likewise all minority groups in Hungary itself are also entitled to the fullest measure of protection of all those rights and privileges which are accepted as the basis of every civilized and decent nation.

Rumania has an unequaled opportunity to face courageously a complex situation and to attempt the solution of a problem which, while perplexing, is yet capable of a peaceful solution. Rumania can go far toward solving the question if she wills to do so. When she signed the minorities treaty she assumed the obligation, as a member of the family of nations, to deal justly with all the minorities within her borders.

REPORTS ARE CONSIDERED

The American committee on minorities has had occasion to study the situation in Rumania from time to time, and your deputation has taken into consideration all former reports made and the replies of the Rumanian Government, and in addition has had access to other reports, such as those to the League of Nations and the various replies of the Rumanian Government. Besides this it has studied with care histories recently written of Rumania, and documents now being circulated through its propaganda department. In view of all the circumstances, while we believe that there has been some improvement in the condition of affairs and that the minorities are being treated with more justice than heretofore, we are also convinced, nevertheless, that a considerable body of public opinion in Rumania will support nothing less than the granting to the minorities of those rights guaranteed by the treaties and considered by all civilized nations as the minimum requisite for an independent existence of a free people.

The commission is of the opinion that there remains a wide discrepancy between the constitution adopted by the State, which is liberal in many respects, and its enforcement through the officials, particularly noticeable in the administration in the outlying districts.

What has been said of the constitution also can be said of the laws relating to civil liberties. The courts have in many instances, some notorious, been either intimidated or deliberately used by groups for their own ends. The Codreanu and Totu murders, involving the killing of a police officer while in the performance of his duties, and the shooting of an innocent Jewish student are two conspicuous examples. Enlightened public opinion will continue to look with disfavor on the administration of the laws of any country where defenseless people find it safer to court arrest than to take their chances on the public streets. That this situation has developed in a number of instances in regard to the Jews is proved by the evidence submitted to the commission.

SYMPATHY FOR COUNTRY'S AIMS

The commission deeply sympathizes with the desire of Rumania to raise the state of its own people that they may have part in the future guidance of its affairs and in the administration of its laws. The system of education formulated is in many regards excellent, especially for citizens of Rumanian speech and race. We believe that the makers of these laws and those responsible for their administration have failed to give sufficient weight to the fact that loyalty can not be achieved by force. Patriotism is instilled by benefits conferred and not by outward compulsion. Every failure to enact school laws equitable to the minorities and every failure to administer them fairly is a grievous error on the part of a great nation endeavoring to use rightly elements which might be built into a loyal citizenship.

The attempt to Rumanianize the minority groups by force and to destroy their confessional schools, managed for centuries by their churches, will, if persisted in, undoubtedly deprive Rumania of the confidence also of people abroad who would otherwise be her friends. Therefore we believe that if Rumania cares to put herself in a good position in the eyes of the rest of the world she will permit the minorities to have the sort of schools to which they are accustomed, grant them a reasonable autonomy, and give them the full right to teach the historic languages of their respective peoples as well as the Rumanian tongue. Supervisors over them should be reduced to a point where, while efficient teaching freed of irredentism is secured, the officials will not handicap these schools in their work. At present the amount of official correspondence is so great that the Government offices are obviously overburdened, and the minorities do not receive replies regarding vital matters sometimes for as long a period as a year after their letters have been sent. The minority schools should especially be given some stability for the future and relieved from the perpetual fear that they may be unfairly closed. The splendid old Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Unitarian, and Jewish institutions, many of them 200 or 300 years old, might well be looked on as an asset instead of a menace to the nation. We call the attention of the leaders of the Eastern Orthodox Church to the fact that, contrary to the understanding of some of them, the subsidies promised the minority schools have not been given.

UNCONCILIATORY ATTITUDE

Many of the Rumanian school officials, where a difference of opinion arises in promulgating a new order or administering a law, adopt an unconciliatory attitude. We are satisfied that these officials could, by conference with minority groups, alleviate a great deal of the misunderstanding which otherwise has been and will continue to be a cause of bitterness.

The commission calls attention to the administration by the Rumanian officials of the citizenship laws. There is no doubt that the fundamental right of citizenship is denied to thousands who are justly entitled to it. Thus they are arbitrarily deprived of those safeguards accorded by every nation to its nationals, and this in spite of solemn guaranties of the minorities.

The commission found, during its visit, that a hideous campaign of intimidation and brutality was being carried on against the Jewish citizens of the State, its motive being a mixture of arrogant intolerance and ignorant hatred. It is true that there is not now as much terrorism as formerly. The improvement is due to three causes: First of all, the systematic campaign carried on for several years against the Jews has so intimidated them that they absent themselves in large part from the universities and public life. Secondly, the virulence of the campaign has reacted unfavorably on Rumanian prestige abroad. Thirdly, the promises of the Liberal Party to certain groups of Jewish voters in the summer of 1927 have brought some cessation of anti-Semitic excesses. We rejoice in this step taken by the party now in control of the Government, and trust that what is now only a temporary party move may become an accepted and sanctioned governmental policy.

SERIOUS DANGER TO PEACE

Without going into detail about the causes of violence preceding and during the election of July 7, 1927—which was generally believed to be a crying scandal in Rumania—we must point out the serious danger to the peace of Europe in the repression of the franchise rights of minorities and groups outside the administration.

The commission was impressed with native intelligence, industry, kindly disposition, and friendliness of the Rumanian people, especially evident among the peasants in the villages. Greater Rumania obviously seeks to find her place among the more forward-looking nations of the world. In view of these facts, which are amply supported by the evidence of all travelers and those best informed, it is extremely unfortunate that the state church should have sanctioned the National Christian Defense League and the National Rumanian Christian Students' Union, whose program and publications are a disgrace to our civilization, an insult to the name of Christian, and a black blot on the fair name of Rumania. We think it most unfortunate that students for the priesthood of the state church should have taken part in demonstrations against fellow citizens of other religious preference or racial background, on the basis of racial or religious prejudice. We courteously, and at the same time urgently, call the attention of the Rumanian State Church to the situation, and in the name of our common Christianity urge that it purge itself of all anti-Semitism and bitterness toward people in Rumania of other racial stocks. We point out the danger of allowing the students in theological schools to continue their agitation against Rumanian citizens of Jewish and other racial origins, either in the Regat or in the annexed territories. The hope of the future of Rumania and the peaceful solution of its problems will vanish from another generation unless the churches and schools contribute to their settlement, which can be secured only by tolerance toward all races and languages.

There has never been in Rumania what has come to be technically known as a pogrom—that is, a massacre inspired and sanctioned by the State.

There have been excesses, acts of terrorism, and such molestation of peaceful elements of the population as to cause continual fear and unrest and generally to reflect badly upon those who are responsible for the peace and welfare of the country. There is moreover grave danger in allowing the youth in the universities and schools to conduct anti-Semitic agitations. Even worse is the complacency with which many people regard the attitude of certain professors and teachers in the schools and universities toward these movements, not only condoning but even encouraging them. The students who develop in the atmosphere of anti-Semitic bitterness will be the citizens and the teachers of to-morrow, and will pay less attention to the pogromless record of their country than their predecessors have done. We believe that this bitterness is not representative of the enlightened opinion of the great body of university professors and school teachers of Rumania; nevertheless, it has been accepted with far too much complacency by the educated citizenship and leadership of the nation.

It is our opinion that certain officials of the Government have made a great mistake in forbidding thousands of individuals, who belong to the minority groups, to maintain their status and in registering as Rumanians those who for some time have spoken other languages. The commission is satisfied that the Rumanian Government could with great profit to itself study the facts relating to the census and the methods by which it was taken. We are convinced that many of these complaints which seem to us justified can easily be righted.

The commission was satisfied that the violence of which the Baptists and other groups complain is actual and constituted a charge of religious persecution and therefore endangers the highest interests of the state church, and the prestige of the nation. We urge the officials of the church, with the Government authorities, to work out some plan by which these people may be granted full religious and civil liberties.

POINTS TO SITUATION OF CHURCHES

We call attention of the Government to the situation of the Hungarian-speaking Lutheran Churches and urge that a legal status satisfactory to them be established.

We call the attention of the Government to the situation of the Roman Catholic minorities, particularly in the Banat, the western borders of Bucovina, and urge that a speedy and satisfactory settlement of the relations between the Government and the Roman Catholic Church be made. The consequences of delay here will intensify the feelings, based as they are on the recognized international claim of the church and its servants.

The attention of the state church is called to many cases of apparent unfairness to the minority churches in the distribution of land under the agrarian laws, to confiscations of church buildings and property of the minority communions; to the proposed laws restricting minority churches; to the present practice of obliging members of minority churches to pay for some of the new buildings of the state church through forced contributions or through the granting of public-park sites to orthodox churches in regions where the orthodox church is itself a minority. We urge this powerful church in the interest of Christian fellowship and good will to use its good offices in bringing together those who feel they have complaints and the Government authorities in order to find a solution.

The commission discovered a feeling of widespread resentment among the members of the minority churches against the compulsion exercised by the Government enforcing them and their children to attend the services of the state church on patriotic occasions. The commission believes that the churches and the Rumanian Government can work out a plan whereby the feelings of members of minority churches will not be violated.

Finally, the commission was impressed by the fact that there are in the annexed territories of greater Rumania great resources of educated citizenship, from which the Rumanian Government could draw with great profit for the service of the State. Many of these citizens at the present time find themselves in despair at what seems to be a studied, determined effort on the part of the majority to discriminate against them in the filling of official positions.

The Rumanian public authorities have been fully and thoroughly warned. I shall quote from the Jewish Daily Bulletin two significant reports. Under date of December 9:

FILDERMAN ACCUSES RUMANIAN GOVERNMENT OF FAILURE TO HEED OUTBREAK WARNINGS

(Text of Doctor Filderman's speech in Parliament)

BUCHAREST, December 9.—The attitude of the Jewish population toward the student outbreaks in Transylvania and Jassy was defined by Dr. William Filderman, president of the Union of Rumanian Jews, speaking in Parliament on the question.

Doctor Filderman said that the Government had had plenty of warning that this sort of thing was going to happen, and it had taken no action to prevent it. The disturbances, he pointed out, had been going on all through the month of November. Yet the Government had not even thought it necessary to order an inquiry. No rioter had been punished; no serious effort had been made to prevent further disturbances.

"Before the congress in Oradia Mare was opened," he said, "I submitted to the Minister of the Interior, M. Duca, a number of memorandums signed, in addition to myself, by Senators Horia Karp and Dr. Emil Jacobi. We warned the minister that the things which have occurred were going to occur and we suggested what measures were necessary in order to prevent them. I declare here that no measures whatever were taken by the Government, neither the measures which we suggested nor others. Things happened in the trains and on the railway stations worse than anything which had happened in the universities. We immediately reported these things to the ministry of the interior, and we were promised an inquiry. I declare that no inquiry whatever was made, and the rioters continued their way to Oradia Mare unhindered.

"In Oradia Mare the rioters gained still more courage and they did things not only worse than anything done at the universities but worse even than anything done in the trains and on the railway stations, worse than anything, in fact, that had happened in recent years. The Aurora, the organ of Doctor Lupu, a minister in the Government, was censored on December 8 because it wrote about the things which had taken place in Oradia Mare. It suggested that something worse had happened than actually was the case. I will not speak of facts which I know because the Government knows them, too. I will only analyze what happened at the congress. M. Lobonzu, the prefect of Bicaz, declared at the congress that the congress was of importance both for the aliens without and the aliens within. Who are these aliens within? The Cuvintul of the 7th instant stated that General Mosciu was present at the congress as the representative of the Government, and that as such he praised the activity and the nationalist fight of the students. The same issue of the Cuvintul stated that the president of the congress made the rare declaration that now they were going to consider with the students the question of the numerous clauses.

"The congress also dealt with the law regarding dead bodies for dissection, with the basic principles of which I, too, agree. Several years ago I myself proposed the enactment of this law to Doctor Anghelescu, then Minister of Education. Doctor Anghelescu replied that the Christian Church would oppose it. As for the Mensas and the students' homes, I am in full agreement with the students that the Government has never kept its promises. I don't know everything that was discussed at the congress, but I do know that the questions which were discussed are formally prohibited by the regulation for order and discipline among the students which was published in the Monitorul Official of May 13, 1923. Student federations are allowed only for the purpose of extending their special studies, and the university rectors are required to take steps to prevent the decisions of the congress being carried out. Further, private persons are prohibited from taking part in the students' gatherings, and on the platform of this congress there was present a Turkish journalist named Achmet Riza Bey. The statutes do not allow students to deliver speeches at meetings. Who gave permission for the resolutions which were adopted to be proposed and discussed? Students are not allowed to participate in societies whose purpose is anarchic. A movement which seeks to change the social position of all the Jews of this country, is it not anarchic? The Government promises to carry out a rigorous investigation. But the investigation and the punishment of the guilty is the duty of the judicial power.

"It would be better for the Government to make clear with whom lies the blame, because the Government failed in its duty to prevent the disturbances. Here there is no need of an inquiry. The punishment must be immediate, because they have shown either that they are accomplices or that they are incompetent. What measures have been taken?

I ask the Prime Minister and the Ministers of the Interior, Justice, Education, and War what measures did they take, first, against the students who beat their Jewish fellow students in the universities and in the streets; secondly, to prevent the disturbances in the trains, on the railway stations, and in Oradia Mare; thirdly, against those representatives of the Government who failed to carry out the laws and engaged in negotiations with irresponsible persons?

"Will the students' organizations which have violated the laws be further tolerated?" Doctor Filderman demanded. "Will the Government in future regard the activities of the anti-Semitic students as anarchic? Will the Government fully compensate the victims? Will the Government rebuild the demolished synagogues? What measures does the Government intend to take against the Government officials and professors who engage in spreading anti-Semitism in the exercise of their official duties? Who covered the costs of the students' congress and of the banquets to the students, which was estimated at 7,000,000 lei? What measures will be taken by the Government against the prefect who termed us 'aliens'? Did General Mosciu represent the Government at the congress?

"I declare in the name of the Jewish population," Doctor Filderman continued, "that we do not want the intervention of Hungary at the League of Nations. Rather than defend us, let the Hungarian Government settle the Jewish question in Hungary."

Turning to the Peasants' Party, Deputy Filderman asked why their organ, Dreptatia, had given no report of the disturbances?

Deputy Madjura replied: "The censor suppressed it. But why are you with the Liberals?"

Doctor Filderman: "Democracy gives everyone a right to his opinions. We held that it was beneficial for the Jews that we should join the Liberals. That is our opinion. You have no right to complain of that."

Deputy Madjura, who followed Deputy Filderman, accused the Government of responsibility for the disturbances. "The Government," he said, "had compelled the university authorities to readmit the students who had been expelled for organizing the anti-Jewish disturbances, and the result was that they had organized these fresh disturbances."

The Minister of the Interior, M. Duca, said that the Government had always expressed its desire to stand in the best possible relations with the Jewish population. "The students are now demanding for the fifth year the enforcement of a numerus clausus. We expelled Professor Cuza from the university," he said. "Others brought him back. The Government will do everything possible to restore order."

Deputy Filderman, speaking again, declared that he was satisfied with the minister's assurance for the future, but he was not satisfied with the present situation. Either M. Duca had not issued any orders or those orders were ignored and those who were responsible for that had not been punished, he declared.

And, again, on December 16:

RUMANIAN GOVERNMENT GIVES FURTHER ASSURANCES AS JEWISH SENATOR PRESSES FOR EXPLANATION

(By our Bucharest correspondent)

BUCHAREST, December 16.—The question of the Rumanian Government's policy in respect to the Jews, in view of the recent excesses, was raised in the Senate to-day by Senator Horia Karp, one of the Jewish representatives, who has been in Transylvania investigating the situation there.

My interpellation, Senator Karp said, is of a general character, and is concerned with the policy of the Government in respect to the Jewish population. During the elections we entered into a bloc with the Government. I am convinced that M. Duca desires a policy of rapprochement toward the Jewish population. The late M. Jan Bratianu also desired it. And yet the Government is culpable because it has supported the nationalist policy of the students. It is not for the school youth to engage in the defense of the national interests. All the citizens of the country stand together in the defense of the great interests of the State. We are not enemies of our country, as our university professors seek to make others believe.

Senator RADUCANU. All the students are not guilty. The guilt lies only with a gang of hooligans.

Senator KARP. Professor Duca said that, too. But I have seen what happened with my own eyes and heard with my own ears. We must not be afraid of what will be said abroad. We shall do greater service to our country if it is known abroad that the Senate will not allow these things to happen. All the governments that have been in power for the last six years have been afraid to touch the students' movement. The students probably imagine now that they are much more than anybody else. What has the present generation given the country except that it has murdered Manciu and Falik? At the congress in Oradia Mare Professor Cetunianu lauded the students because they are demanding a numerus clausus, and Professor Paulescu praised them because they have driven the Jews out of the medical faculty. No one was punished after what happened at Dorna-Vatra or Rimnic Vilcia, nor after the incidents in the universities. Of course, things have gone so far that the students have even attacked soldiers and officers. If the students wished, they could have killed thousands of people in Oradia Mare. It is intolerable that teachers, professors, and prelates should take part in the anti-Semitic movement. A priest who consecrates the banner of the swastika is no Christian. In Czernowitz a Jew bequeathed money for a students' home, and not a single Jew is allowed to enter that home.

"The Government," Senator Karp proceeded, "has not kept its word to carry out a policy of rapprochement. M. Duca is shielding Secretary of State Tatarescu. M. Tatarescu ought himself to resign his post in the Government. The Universul, the paper of the Minister of Justice, M. Popescu, said that the students were provoked. If a newspaper published by a member of the Government writes in that fashion, the students may well think that they have a right to do whatever they wish. It is a lie to say that anyone provoked the students. The Jews took 1,000 students into their homes and fed and lodged them during the congress, and they paid for many other students who were put up at hotels because they had no room to billet them in their homes. When I asked the procuror what evidence there was that boiling water had been poured upon the students from Weiszlovicz's Hotel, he replied that he had seen a pool of water on the pavement. I am glad that for the first time in six years the Government is now condemning these acts of barbarism, and that certain sanctions have been made. Perhaps other sanctions will follow, for in Oradia Mare and in Cluj none of the authorities did their duty. The police chief allowed himself to be carried shoulder high by the students while they were shouting 'Down with the Jews.' I hope that that fine Christian declaration made by Bishop Cieragariu will impress the students and have some effect upon them. The students are demanding punishment for those who are libeling them. But the students demolished five synagogues and shops and private houses and looted property. In Oradia Mare they were seen carrying parcels of goods, and in Bucharest stolen goods were taken from them.

"When I visited the synagogue in Oradia Mare the general who was with me crossed himself, seeing the havoc that had been wrought there. Peasants wept when they saw the desolation that had been made of the synagogues, and one peasant woman fell on her knees and prayed to God that he should not punish all Christians because of this sacrilege. Twenty-eight scrolls of the law were torn to pieces in Cluj. The dust carts came and collected them as if they were so much refuse. The Jews had to pick the pieces of parchment out of the dust heaps. If the students in Cluj took no part in the disturbances, how did the students know where all the six synagogues were situated? On the second day the students came to the university with pieces of parchment from scrolls of the law in their lapels. Even those who were living with Jews wore these pieces of parchment in their lapels.

"I demand of the Government," Senator Karp cried, "that it should protect the Jewish population, that it should prohibit professors from engaging in anti-Semitic propaganda, that it should grant a moratorium of three months to those traders who have suffered damage, and that the autonomy of the universities should be withdrawn where it is a question of public security. If the Government does this, these events will not occur again."

M. Duca, Minister of the Interior, said in reply: "I understand the feelings of M. Karp, especially in view of the disgraceful profanation of the synagogues. I represent not only my personal opinion, but the opinion of the whole Government. We believe that the consolidation of Greater Rumania must take place with the cooperation of all the minorities. We have taken steps to punish the guilty officials, and I declare that we have not yet finished. When the inquiry is completed, other punishment will follow. We are determined to rid Rumania of the feelings which now dominate our university youth. We ask Senator Karp to have confidence in us and not to raise too often questions which have already been dealt with. We shall restore the synagogues which have been demolished and we shall compensate the victims."

Rumania achieved its independence at the Congress of Berlin, held in 1878, in which the leading personages were Lord Beaconsfield and Bismarck, the greatest European statesmen of the day, and of many times. It was due to the efforts of these statesmen that a clause was placed in the treaty with Rumania wherein Rumania guaranteed equal treatment to all religions. How this clause was carried out by Rumania requires no extended discussion. But let us now turn to the famous letter of our own John Hay, Secretary of State, to the Rumanian Government, dated August 11, 1902:

SECRETARY HAY TO RUMANIA

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 11, 1902.

EXCELLENCY: In the course of an instruction recently sent to the minister accredited to the Government of Rumania in regard to the bases of negotiation begun with that Government looking to a convention of naturalization between the United States and Rumania, certain considerations were set forth for the minister's guidance concerning the character of the emigration from that country, the causes which constrain it, and the consequences so far as they adversely affect the United States.

It has seemed to the President appropriate that these considerations, relating as they do to the obligations entered into by the signatories of the treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, should be brought to the attention of the governments concerned and commended to their consideration in the hope that, if they are so fortunate as to meet the approval of the several powers, such measures as to them may seem wise may be taken to persuade the Government of Rumania to reconsider the subject of the grievances in question.

The United States welcomes now, as it has welcomed from the foundation of its Government, the voluntary immigration of all aliens coming hither under conditions fitting them to become merged in the body politic of this land. Our laws provide the means for them to become incorporated indistinguishably in the mass of citizens and prescribe their absolute equality with the native born, guaranteeing to them equal civil rights at home and equal protection abroad. The conditions are few, looking to them coming as free agents, so circumstanced physically and morally as to supply the healthful and intelligent material of free citizenhood. The pauper, the criminal, the contagiously or incurably diseased are excluded from the benefits of immigration only when they are likely to become a source of danger or a burden upon the community. The voluntary character of their coming is essential; hence we shut out all immigration assisted or constrained by foreign agencies. The purpose of our generous treatment of the alien immigrant is to benefit us and him alike—not to afford to another State a field upon which to cast its own objectionable elements. The alien, coming hither voluntarily and prepared to take upon himself the preparatory and in due course the definitive obligations of citizenship, retains thereafter, in domestic and international relations, the initial character of free agency, in the full enjoyment of which it is incumbent upon his adoptive State to protect him.

The foregoing considerations, whilst pertinent to the examination of the purpose and scope of a naturalization treaty, have a larger aim. It behooves the State to scrutinize most jealously the character of the immigration from a foreign land, and if it be obnoxious to objection to examine the causes which render it so. Should those causes originate in the act of another sovereign State, to the detriment of its neighbors, it is the prerogative of an injured State to point out the evil and to make remonstrance; for with nations, as with individuals, the social law holds good that the right of each is bounded by the right of the neighbor.

The condition of a large class of the inhabitants of Rumania has for many years been a source of grave concern to the United States. I refer to the Rumanian Jews numbering some 400,000. Long ago while the Danubian principalities labored under oppressive conditions, which only war and a general action of the European powers sufficed to end, the persecution of the indigenous Jews under Turkish rule called forth in 1872 the strong remonstrance of the United States. The treaty of Berlin was hailed as a cure for the wrong in view of the express provisions of its forty-fourth article, prescribing that "In Rumania the difference of religious creeds and confessions shall not be alleged against any person as a ground for exclusion or incapacity in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil and political rights, admission to public employments, functions, and honors, or the exercise of the various professions and industries in any locality whatsoever," and stipulating freedom in the exercise of all forms of worship to Rumanian dependents and foreigners alike, as well as guaranteeing that all foreigners in Rumania shall be treated without distinction of creed on a footing of perfect equality.

With the lapse of time these just prescriptions have been rendered nugatory in great part, as regards the native Jews, by the legislation and municipal regulations of Rumania. Starting from the arbitrary and controvertible premise that the native Jews of Rumania domiciled there for centuries are "aliens not subject to foreign protection," the ability of the Jew to earn even the scanty means of existence that suffice for a frugal race has been constricted by degrees until nearly every opportunity to win a livelihood is denied, and until the helpless poverty of the Jew has constrained an exodus of such proportions as to cause general concern.

The political disabilities of the Jews in Rumania, their exclusion from the public service and the learned professions, the limitations of their civil rights and the imposition upon them of exceptional taxes, involving as they do wrongs repugnant to the moral sense of liberal, modern peoples, are not so directly in point for my present purpose as the public acts which attack the inherent right of man as a bread-winner in the ways of agriculture and trade. The Jews are prohibited from owning land, or even from cultivating it as common laborers. They are debarred from residing in the rural districts. Many branches of petty trade and manual production are closed to them in the overcrowded cities where they are forced to dwell and engage, against fearful odds, in the desperate struggle for existence. Even as ordinary artisans or hired laborers they may only find employment in the proportion of one "unprotected alien" to two "Rumanians" under any one employer. In short, by the cumulative effect of successive restrictions the Jews of Rumania have become reduced to a state of wretched misery. Shut out from nearly every avenue of self-support which is open to the poor of other lands, and ground down by poverty as the natural result of their discriminatory treatment, they are rendered incapable of lifting themselves from the enforced degradation they endure. Even were the fields of education, of civil employment, and of commerce open to them as to "Rumanian citizens," their penury would prevent their rising by individual effort. Human beings so circumstanced have virtually no alternative but submissive suffering or flight to some land less unfavorable to them. Removal under such conditions is not and can not be the healthy, intelligent emigration of a free and self-reliant being. It must be, in most cases, the mere transplantation of an artificially produced diseased growth to a new place.

Granting that in better and more healthful surroundings the morbid conditions will eventually change for good, such emigration is necessarily for a time a burden to the community upon which the fugitives may be cast. Self-reliance and the knowledge and ability that evolve the power of self-support must be developed and, at the same time, avenues of employment must be opened in quarters where competition is already keen and opportunities scarce. The teachings of history and the experience of our own Nation show that the Jews possess in a high degree of the mental and moral qualifications of conscientious citizenhood. No class of immigrants is more welcome to our shores when coming equipped in mind and body for entrance upon the struggle for bread and inspired with the high purpose to give the best service of heart and brain to the land they adopt of their own free will. But when they come as outcasts, made doubly paupers by physical and moral oppression in their native land, and thrown upon the long-suffering generosity of a more favored community, their migration lacks the essential conditions which make alien immigration either acceptable or beneficial. So well is this appreciated on the Continent that, even in the countries where anti-Semitism has no foothold, it is difficult for these fleeing Jews to obtain any lodgment. America is their only goal.

The United States offers asylum to the oppressed of all lands. But its sympathy with them in no wise impairs its just liberty and right to weigh the acts of the oppressor in the light of their effects upon this country and to judge accordingly.

Putting together the facts now painfully brought home to this Government during the past few years, that many of the inhabitants of Rumania are being forced by artificially adverse discriminations to quit their native country; that the hospitable asylum offered by this country is almost the only refuge left to them; and they come hither unfitted by the conditions of their exile to take part in the new life of this land under circumstances either profitable to themselves or beneficial to the community; and that they are objects of charity from the outset and for a long time—the right of remonstrance against the acts of the Rumanian Government is clearly established in favor of this Government. Whether consciously and of purpose or not, these helpless people, burdened and spurned by their native land, are forced by the sovereign power of Rumania upon the charity of the United States. This Government can not be a tacit party to such an international wrong. It is constrained to protest against the treatment to which the Jews of Rumania are subjected, not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury to itself but in the name of humanity. The United States may not authoritatively appeal to the stipulations of the treaty of Berlin, to which it was not and can not become a signatory, but it does earnestly appeal to the principles consigned therein, because they are the principles of international law and eternal justice, advocating the broad toleration which that solemn compact enjoins and standing ready to lend its moral support to the fulfillment thereof by its cosignatories, for the act of Rumania itself has effectively joined the United States to them as an interested party in this regard.

You will take an early occasion to read this instruction to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and should he request it leave with him a copy.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

Rumania has been openly and notoriously violating every pledge made by it during this period of 50 years. A similar restriction on the Rights of Religious Minorities was placed upon Rumania in the covenant of the League of Nations. The same evasion of its terms which characterized Rumania's brutal disregard of its obligations of 1878 characterize also its evasion of obligations under the treaty of 1918. In other words, Rumania can not be trusted.

On the other hand, the Rumanian Government is seeking to avoid its responsibility by claiming that some of the excesses committed against its Jewish subjects were the work of foreign conspirators. According to a statement made by the Rumanian Government to Lucian Wolf, secretary of the joint foreign committee of the Board of Jewish Deputies, an Anglo-Jewish association of London, the Rumanian Government claims that it will take all legal steps to put down the excesses without fear or favor. The statement continues that the Rumanian Government will do its full duty because it realizes that the first victim of disturbances is Rumania herself. If that is the truth, and if it really represents Rumania's attitude in the matter, we can only hope and pray that the powers to be in Rumania will realize how important it is to do what it pretends to do. A large number of British, American, and Continental European concerns have withdrawn credits from Rumanian industry and commerce. This is but a step in the right direction. If the Rumanian Government is powerless to stop the outrages, then the Rumanian Government can not be trusted. If the Rumanian Government is anxious to put an end to the excesses, it can do so and will obtain full cooperation and sympathy from this country. We do not believe in religious persecution. We have written into our Constitution (first amendment):

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

The Constitution also says (Article VI, subdivision 3):

> No religious tests shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

We believe that it is the duty of government to cherish, aid, and assist those who exercise religion in any form, and the Government will never dream of imposing any religion from without. If Rumania wishes to maintain the good will of this country, if she desires to continue in the esteem of the world, she should put an end to excesses and punish the guilty.

Only by continued strong and unequivocal action on its part can Rumania expect this country to continue to maintain relations with it.

In 1910 this House saw fit by unanimous resolution to urge upon the President of the United States to abrogate the treaty this country had with Russia, because of Russian persecution of the Jews. This House was unanimous and the resolution proposed was carried with but one dissenting vote. Let us show a united front to Rumania at this time. Either she ceases her anti-Jewish excesses or we shall cease all intercourse with Rumania.

I hope that this latter course will not be necessary and that Rumania will once and for all maintain her promises and her dignity as a nation.

RUMANIA ARRAIGNED AT THE BAR OF PUBLIC OPINION FOR ITS ATROCITIES

The American people should take notice of the action in Rumania with respect to the destruction of life and property and desecration of places of worship of its inhabitants.

Rumania's failure to stop these atrocities would be justification for America's refusal to treat with it as a civilized nation.

In 1902 Rumania mistreated its minorities, and then the late John Hay, Secretary of State, stated the American views, as follows:

> The right to remonstrate against the acts of the Rumanian Government is clearly established in favor of this Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD].

GEORGE ROGERS CLARK MEMORIAL

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, February 25, 1779, Fort Sackville, Ind., with its British garrison was surrendered to the American forces under the leadership of that courageous soldier and patriot, George Rogers Clark. That date marks the culmination of one of the most eventful and colorful campaigns in the annals of American history.

No military campaign contributed more to the greatness of America than this engagement, and no military leader received so little recognition for his valiant services than has George Rogers Clark and his band of pioneer patriots. All that vast territory between the Alleghenies and the Mississippi River north of the Ohio River to the Great Lakes was under the control and domination of the British. Savage bands of Indians, urged on by unscrupulous British leaders to a frenzy of fiendish delight, were committing unspeakable horrors and depredations on the scattered frontiersmen. The struggling Kentucky pioneer settlers were threatened with extinction and the peace and security of the Nation menaced by the British control of this territory.

George Rogers Clark knew the necessities of the time. He had a vision of America's future greatness. He saw a vast empire in the Northwest Territory, without which the American Nation would be circumscribed and impotent among the nations of the world, a nation confined to the Atlantic seaboard, hemmed in by foreign powers. He realized the new nation could not expand to its cherished greatness with England in possession of our back door.

At the time he was fighting for the preservation of American pioneer settlements in Kentucky, where Daniel Boone and Si Kenton were distinguishing themselves in that dramatic period of Indian warfare and frontier settlement in the Kentucky country. Wave after wave of Indian sallies were devastating the white settlements north of the Ohio and spreading consternation and havoc among the Kentucky settlers by their fresh outrages, instigated by British posts north of the Ohio River.

He conceived the idea of proceeding across the Ohio, attack the British posts at Kaskaskia and Cahokia on the Mississippi River on the Illinois side and Vincennes on the Wabash River on the Indiana side, wrest those posts from the enemy, and by so doing break up the British nests instigating Indian outrages and add that vast domain east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio to the Republic, then in the making. With this vision in mind he returned to his native State of Virginia. He was born in 1752 in Albemarle County, Va., a mile and a half from Monticello, Thomas Jefferson's birthplace, where the father of the Declaration of Independence lived and now lies buried. He was a boyhood friend of that great statesman and nine years his junior. That friendship continued throughout their lives. It was soon to play an important part in that critical period and in America's future greatness.

George Rogers Clark was one of six brothers, all of whom served with distinction in the Revolutionary War except William, who was too young. William later achieved distinction as the Clark in the famous Lewis and Clark expedition through the great Northwest to the Oregon country. Patrick Henry, of "Give me liberty or give me death" fame, was then Governor of Virginia. He received Clark's proposal with sympathy, but with hesitation. He realized the limits of the Old Dominion State at that time and the absolute necessity of the success of American arms in Washington's campaign against the British. All available men and supplies were most urgently needed for Washington's army.

Thomas Jefferson was called into the conference. Jefferson at once grasped the possibilities and importance of the plan. In this conference were also George Mason and George Wythe, two other sturdy Virginia patriots of that day. As a result of the conference, largely through the influence of Jefferson, Governor Henry persuaded the assembly to approve, it is said, without the assembly knowing the full import of the mission, and George Rogers Clark was commissioned a colonel of Virginia Militia, authorized to draw twelve hundred pounds from the public treasury, to raise and equip 7 companies of 50 men each to proceed to the Kentucky country for the avowed purpose of defending the Kentucky pioneers against British and Indian outrages.

Clark was given two sets of instructions; one public and to be used in raising his army for the defense of the Kentucky settlement, the other confidential, the authority to Clark to wage his campaign north of the Ohio. He finally succeeded in raising and equipping 150 men. Marching directly to the Ohio and down that river, he made camp on Corn Island, in the Ohio, between Jeffersonville, Ind., and Louisville, Ky. A small company of Kentucky riflemen, who it was thought could be spared from the hard-pressed settlements of Kentucky, joined him. When it was learned the object in view was to attack the British posts north of the Ohio River, some of the more weak-hearted deserted him. For the historic data of this remarkable campaign in the Illinois country we have the journal of Captain Bowman, Clark's most courageous, valiant, and trusted officer, written at the time of the campaign; Clark's letter of November 19, 1779, to George Mason; and the memoirs of Clark prepared at the suggestion of James Madison.

On the 24th of June, 1778, during a total eclipse of the sun, he proceeded down the falls of the Ohio with Kaskaskia on the Mississippi River as his first objective, but with old Fort Sackville at Vincennes as his main objective. During the preceding year he had sent two men into the Kaskaskia country to get the lay of the land and the sentiment of the French settlers toward the new Republic. It was known the British watched the Mississippi well. An unsuspected route must be taken. Silently and swiftly he dropped down the Ohio to the mouth of Massac Creek, secreted their flatboats, and made ready to travel a primeval overland route to Kaskaskia of 100 miles. This route took them through the counties of Massac, Johnson, Williamson, Jackson, and Randolph.

He knew Kaskaskia to be the more vulnerable point, and the wisdom of striking the first blow at that far-removed settlement and getting the people of that French settlement with him, many of whom he had learned were already friendly to the American cause. The route traveled was through a perilous wilderness infested with 15 powerful and hostile Indian tribes in sympathy with the British.

July 4, 1778, Kaskaskia was taken by surprise and the garrison captured without firing a gun. Displaying a spirit of boldness and diplomacy rare in the annals of history, the Kaskaskians, who had been deceived by the British into believing the Big Knives, as the Kentucky riflemen were then known, were ruthless savages and cannibals, were allowed for some time to maintain this opinion. Clark was a master strategist and diplomat of the frontier country. His boldness so awed the settlement that when a meeting was called and the friendly alliance between France and America was disclosed, and he informed them of his desire to bring the blessings of liberty to them, the terror of the Creoles was soon changed to joy and they readily took the oath of allegiance to America.

A company, under the command of Captain Bowman, was sent to Cahokia, on the Mississippi River, a few miles below St. Louis. Some of the French inhabitants of Kaskaskia voluntarily sought permission to join the company. They soon persuaded the residents of Cahokia that the Americans were their true friends, and the garrison at Cahokia surrendered and became subjects of the new Republic. A French priest, Father Gibault, of Kaskaskia and Vincennes, in sympathy with the American cause, when assured that freedom of religion would not be interfered with, cast his powerful influence with Clark, and there, and later at Vincennes, was a most powerful factor in adding to the success of the expedition.

Governor Hamilton was in possession of the British fort at Vincennes. Between Clark and Hamilton lay some 150 miles of wilderness and swamp. Clark realized the necessity of striking at Hamilton before the British learned of his exploits in the Kaskaskia country. He boldly resolved to march against Vincennes without delay. To have gone down the Mississippi and up the Ohio and the Wabash would have been too costly in time. He sent the Willing, a boat laden with supplies and munitions, by that route, with instructions to meet him in the Wabash below Vincennes.

February 5, 1779, four companies, possibly 160 men, well armed but without tents and horses, except a few pack horses, departed from Kaskaskia on the desperate journey through forests, across swimming prairies, and flooded rivers of Illinois for Vincennes. Trees were felled for crossing streams that could not be forded, pirogues hastily constructed for crossing deeper and wider streams. The route ran in a northeasterly direction on the high ground between the Kaskaskia and St. Mary Rivers, through Sparta, in Randolph County, Nashville, in Washington County, then veering to the east, through section 9 in the northwest corner of Jefferson County into Walnut Hill, Marion County. Through Marion County into Clay, through Xenia, Flora, a short distance south of Clay City, crossing the Little Wabash River and Big Muddy Creek, 3 miles apart at point of crossing, a raging stream, 5 miles from bank to bank when crossed, through Richland County, a few miles south of Olney, through Sumner, in Lawrence County, on to Lawrenceville, on the Embarrass River. Here, on the 18th, they heard the morning guns at Fort Sackville.

While there is some controversy as to the exact route pursued by Clark on this march, the best authorities seem to be agreed that the above route was the one followed. He hastened impetuously through wilderness, swamps, and flooded prairies, across waters that could not be bridged, feeling that when once across all dreams of retreat would be foreclosed, and the eyes of his troops would be centered on Vincennes.

Finding the high water of the Embarrass blocked their crossing, they proceeded in a southeasterly course about 9 miles below the mouth of the Embarrass. The Wabash River and other streams at this time of the year were a vast lake, and in the more shallow water and swamps ice had formed and the weather was cold and disagreeable. No man would have ventured through wilderness and swamps and surging streams unless inspired by the spirit of liberty and patriotism. This cool, brave youth of 27, who led these men, had a vision possessed by few men in history, and the courage to carry that vision into execution.

The Willing, that had been sent down the Mississippi and up the Ohio, could not be found. Canoes were hastily constructed. On the 21st the army began to be ferried across the Wabash below the mouth of the Embarrass, about a mile and one-half above St. Francisville. Crossing to the Indiana side, they immediately started their march northward toward Vincennes. Warrior's Island, 2 miles from Vincennes, was reached on the 23d, the army floundering through mud and water, half numb with cold, and weak from exposure.

The fort is described as an irregular inclosure about 60 feet at its narrowest place and 200 feet at the widest point, of 2 or 3 acres. It was surrounded by a stockade 10 or 12 feet high, with blockhouses at the corners or angles. In the center was a blockhouse also, which served as quarters for the officers and supply depot. Clark's men had been almost entirely without food and water for six days.

Lieutenant Bailey, with 14 Regulars, was detached to fire on the fort while possession of the town was undertaken by the others. The garrison was taken completely by surprise. The sharpshooters were too much for the men inside the fort, and every time a British soldier showed himself at a porthole he was picked off by one of the sharpshooters.

At 9 o'clock on the morning of the 24th Clark sent a letter to Governor Hamilton demanding immediate surrender and admonished him not to destroy the stores or papers or letters in his possession under penalty of no mercy shown. Hamilton replied that he and his garrison were not disposed to be awed into any action unworthy of British subjects. The firing again commenced. Hamilton sent a letter to Clark proposing a three-day truce to consider such terms as he proposed.

Clark refused, fearing that reinforcements on the way from Detroit would reach Hamilton. He suggested that Hamilton meet him, with Captain Helm, who was held a prisoner in the fort, at the church about 80 yards from the fort. Hamilton proposed terms of capitulation with certain conditions, all of which were rejected by Clark. Clark demanded that Hamilton surrender at discretion, that his troops were impatient to storm the fort, and the result of an enraged body of woodsmen breaking in would be beyond the power of an American officer to save a single man.

Hamilton inquired Clark's reason for refusing the garrison on any other terms than at discretion and was told that he wanted an excuse to put to death the Indian partisans or otherwise treat them as he thought proper; that the cries of the widows and orphans of the frontier which they had occasioned now required their blood; that if Hamilton chose to risk the massacre of his garrison for their sakes it was his own pleasure.

Late in the evening terms of capitulation were signed. The next morning by 10 o'clock, February 25, 1779, Governor Hamilton and his garrison marched out; Colonel Clark and his forces marched in, relieved the sentinels, and secured all the arms and stores. Two days after the capture the Willing arrived, but the fort was already in the possession of the Americans.

By Clark's victory the American flag was hoisted never to be hauled down in that vast empire secured to the Union by that memorable campaign. It forever put an end to that bloody carnage of Indian warfare instigated by the British against helpless women and children and defenseless men. It brought peace and security to the pioneer settlers west of the Alleghanies. It forever ended the British-Indian alliances that threatened to break through our back door and by organized raids attack and assail our frontiers from the west. All forces, power, and energy could now be centered on the conflict waged by Washington against the British to bring that conflict to a glorious conclusion.

It was a most potent factor in the success of American arms which gained for the new nation independence from the British Crown. It added as an integral part of the territory of this Nation about 250,000 square miles, from which has been carved five great Commonwealths—Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, and Wisconsin. That territory contains more than 25,000,000 people, one-fifth the entire population of the Nation. More than one-fourth of the total agricultural and manufactured products of the country are here produced. More than one-fourth of the Federal taxes are paid into the Treasury by the inhabitants of this territory. The center of population is located within this section. It is the real heart of the American Nation. This inspired vision of George Rogers Clark, made real by his daring, skill, and strategy, and the valor and courage of his pioneer army, stands out as a monumental achievement in American history.

Senate Joint Resolution 23, which passed the Senate February 24 of this year, makes provision for the participation by the Federal Government in a celebration to be held in 1929 and 1930 of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the conquest of the Northwest Territory by George Rogers Clark and his army of sturdy frontiersmen. It authorizes an appropriation for a permanent memorial at Vincennes, Ind., on the site of old Fort Sackville in commemoration of the event. This is a most worthy recognition of the services of that gallant soldier and his sturdy band of patriots to the American Revolution and the American Nation.

This march of George Rogers Clark and his sturdy band from Kaskaskia to Vincennes is of especial interest to the people of my district. Four counties in the twenty-third Illinois congressional district, the district I have the honor to represent in this body, were traversed in this history-making campaign, and about half the entire route was within the limits of the district as now located. The route of this memorable march through the Illinois country should be designated by proper markings throughout its length that the present and future generations may know the course traversed by this American patriot and his pioneer army.

This resolution should be adopted that a fitting memorial may be erected on the site of old Fort Sackville as a reminder of the patriotic services and unsurpassed valor and dauntless courage of George Rogers Clark and his pioneer heroes. It is a well deserved honor. It will quicken the patriotic pulse of future generations and redound to the good of a patriotic, liberty-loving America. [Applause.]

SENATE

THURSDAY, March 22, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, who hast brought us through the darkness of night to the light of the morning, pour into our souls Thy holy light, that we may ever be devoted to Thee, by whose wisdom we were created, by whose mercy we have been redeemed, and by whose providence we are governed. Fill us with Thy spirit and send us forth as sons of God, that we may glory in all the discipline of life, the tasks and trials by which we are trained to patience and to self-control. Give us wisdom, courage, and understanding, adequate to the demand of the leadership whereunto Thou hast called us, and a faith which shall dispel all the shadows of earth and fill the saddest moments of life with the light of an immortal love. Grant this, O Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE COPLEY PRESS (INC.)

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in relation to some remarks that I made here the other day in regard to the Copley Printing Co., I received a cablegram from Mr. Copley. I ask unanimous consent to have it read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the cablegram, as follows:

NAPOLI, March 20, 1928.

SENATOR NORRIS,
Washington, D. C.:

Your resolution regarding me has been cabled. I know you are honest and fair. I sold my utility in January, two years ago, to Rollins and Fitkin, retaining only underlying interest. One year ago Fitkin sold to Rollins. Two months ago Rollins sold to Insull. After my sale I retained the presidency, solely as a guaranty to thousands of local investors. However, I performed no executive act. Since purchased by Insull I have not been officer or director, and could not elect myself director without his consent. I do not own any interest in any other utility. I have owned good newspapers for 25 years. I retained these when selling the utility, as they never had any relation. After resting a year and one-half, it became evident to me that I must work. So I looked over the field and bought several more newspapers. The total value, about one-fifth the Chicago Tribune or New York Times. I have no alliance with or agreement with or understanding with any utility man or any utility interest in the world. You have been deceived by some man who does not know. I suspect by some enthusiastic municipal-ownership believer, who does not appreciate the necessity for fair treatment to some one whom he may suspect, whether correctly or not. If this statement is true, you owe me reparation of the wrong you have inadvertently done to me. If this statement is false, I have amply earned the contempt of all honest men.

COPLEY.

CONSTRUCTION OF NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. EDGE (for Mr. EDWARDS) presented editorials from the Morning Post and the Evening Courier, of Camden, N. J., of the 19th instant, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Evening Courier, Monday, March 19, 1928]

SAVE THE SHIPYARDS!

Seldom does an act of Congress, completed or merely proposed, encounter objection from a Camden slant so perfectly matching the national interest in the matter as in the Dallinger amendment to the naval construction bill in the House of Representatives.

After a hot fight between the big-navy men backing Wilbur's plan for 71 ships, and the people who would leave us practically defenseless at sea, the victory went to those reasonable-minded and practical persons who supported the bill for 15 cruisers and an airplane carrier as the plan of wisdom and efficiency.

That was a victory for common sense, showing the world that we intend to protect ourselves and our commerce without challenging the powers to an armament race.

And then, as the plan seemed assured of success, the Representative from Massachusetts, in an excess of zeal for the navy yards of his own State, secures House support for an amendment requiring that half these ships be built in Government yards.

Mistaken zeal, because the art of shipbuilding must be preserved in this country.

This amendment, which decreases the allowance of Government shipbuilding that may come to Camden, is earnestly opposed by the Courier, not merely on behalf of local workers but because the shipyards on the Delaware are vitally important to the Nation.

Shipbuilding combines besides many trades the fine art of putting their products together in the form of a modern ship, a city afloat.

That skill can be preserved only through use.

Without constant practice it would inevitably decay.

The Dallinger amendment if accepted by the Senate would hurt shipbuilding in this country beyond repair.

Distribution of these Government contracts is of supreme interest locally. But that tremendous local interest is overshadowed by the national interest which supports the local claims.

We see it as more than a matter of Camden's good, furnishing employment for more than 3,500 skilled shipyard workers now out of work.

We see it as an essential factor of preparedness. In a national emergency we'll need warships in a hurry. The empty shipyards may still be there. But where will be the skilled workers to man these yards?

That Dallinger amendment must die in the Senate.

And Jersey's Senators owe it to the State and to the Nation to lead the fight for better distribution of these contracts for 15 cruisers and an airplane carrier.

[From the Morning Post, Monday, March 19, 1928]

AN AMENDMENT THAT HITS CAMDEN HARD AND THE NATION HARDER

Only 1,600 men are employed to-day in the shipbuilding department of the Brown-Boveri plant in Camden.

Three thousand four hundred other men—all first-class shipbuilders who live in the neighborhood of the Brown-Boveri yards—are out of work.

When the naval appropriation bill came up in Congress Friday providing for the construction of 15 cruisers and an airplane carrier, Representative DALLINGER, of Massachusetts, rose to his feet with an amendment. It provided that half of these ships be built at Government-owned navy yards. The amendment was passed.

There was a certain selfishness in the Dallinger amendment. There are Government navy yards up in his district, and he wants as much of the work as possible to go there.

There is a certain selfishness in this editorial. We strongly oppose the Dallinger amendment, and one of the reasons we oppose it is that it would reduce the number of contracts the Brown-Boveri Co. will secure and thus would keep idle more than 3,000 Camden shipbuilders.

But there is a point at issue that is greater than the question of whether New England or New Jersey workers shall build the cruisers for the American Navy.

This is it:

The Government does not own enough navy yards to build a large number of ships quickly if an emergency arose.

The privately owned shipyards can meet nearly any emergency. They proved they could in 1917–18.

Now, if 50 per cent of the peace-time naval construction program is handed over to navy yards it will be a hard blow at the privately owned yards. In Camden, as one example, many of those 3,400 idle shipyard workers will give up shipbuilding entirely. They will drift into other trades and stay there. Many of them will move far away from shipbuilding centers, and it would be hard to bring them back, even in an emergency.

The danger doesn't end with the employment problem, either. The owners of the shipyard, once they come to the conclusion that the Government intends to build half its naval vessels, will soon begin dismantling their yards. Some of them already have passed out of existence—Cramps, for example.

The result will be that we won't have the yards in which to build ships when we need them. That would be a national calamity.

The Dallinger amendment was a bad amendment for Camden and a worse amendment for the country as a whole.

The House passed the appropriation bill with this amendment and sent it over to the Senate.

We hope to see the Senate pass the appropriation bill without the amendment. We hope to see Senators EDGE and EDWARDS lead the fight against it.

Shipbuilding must not be allowed to disintegrate, not merely because it will throw men out of work, though that is a good reason in itself. But a bigger reason than that of unemployment is that when all our shipbuilding plants are booming along they constitute a most important phase of our national defense.

SENATORIAL CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in behalf of the special committee investigating expenditures in senatorial primary and general elections, I desire to submit a report in two parts.

The first one (Rept. No. 603) states in substance that Thomas W. Cunningham was a defiant and contumacious witness before the committee, and the committee recommends that by reason thereof he be adjudged in comtempt of the committee and of the Senate of the United States. To-morrow, if I can obtain the floor, I shall offer an appropriate resolution for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendation of the committee. It will ask for a warrant to be issued by the Vice President for the arrest of Mr. Cunningham and directing that he be brought before the bar of the Senate for such action as the Senate may determine.

The second report (No. 603, pt. 2) which I submit relates to the witnesses Insull and Schuyler. I shall ask, following the disposition of the Cunningham matter, to take action upon the report last referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be received and placed on file.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day, when I submitted a report dealing with the witness Cunningham, who had been before the special committee investigating campaign expenditures, I stated that I would offer on to-morrow a resolution providing for an order of arrest to be issued by the President of the Senate. I am offering the resolution now and give notice that to-morrow I shall ask for the consideration of the resolution. One of the members of the special committee will not be here for a few days, perhaps, after to-morrow, and therefore I am inclined to offer it now, hoping that the matter may be disposed of on to-morrow.

The resolution (S. Res. 179) was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas it appears from the report of the Special Committee Investigating Expenditures in Senatorial Primary and General Elections that a witness, Thomas W. Cunningham, twice called before the committee making inquiry as directed by the Senate under Senate Resolution 195 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, declined to answer certain questions relative and pertinent to the matter then under inquiry:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of said Thomas W. Cunningham wherever found, and to bring the said Thomas W. Cunningham before the bar of the Senate, then and there or elsewhere as it may direct, to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate, through its said committee, or the President of the Senate, may propound, and to keep the said Thomas W. Cunningham in custody to await further order of the Senate.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement of useless papers in the State Department, which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking toward their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed Mr. BORAH and Mr. SWANSON members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

ANDREW W. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate Resolution 173, coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 173) submitted by Mr. COUZENS March 20, 1928, as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States has since October 23, 1923, been investigating the disposition of our naval oil reserves; and

Whereas for nearly all of this time there have been new developments until up to the present time there has been disclosed the worst trail of fraud and corruption in public life that has existed in our history; and

Whereas for considerably over four years Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, has been familiar with the relationship of Harry F. Sinclair to the Republican National Committee of that period, and which relationship disclosed that the said committee received at least $160,000 of Liberty bonds from Harry F. Sinclair to pay the committee's indebtedness for the 1920 campaign; and

Whereas in November, 1923, Andrew W. Mellon was informed of the source of these bonds and received from the chairman of said committee $50,000 of the bonds; and

Whereas it is true that he returned these bonds, yet he at no time revealed this information until it was indicated from another source; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate have been holding hearings on Resolution 105, to investigate the conditions in certain bituminous coal fields; and

Whereas in the course of this investigation the Pittsburgh Coal Co., a Mellon enterprise, it has been disclosed, has done everything it could to defeat obtaining accurate findings as to its mines by the issuance of the following order:

"To all mine superintendents:

"The United States Senate investigating committee is now visiting the Pittsburgh district. Clean up all unsightly conditions. Keep our police in the background. Avoid all arrests. Instruct our men to keep out of trouble. If the committee desires to question any of our employees, see to it that you present men you can trust and who can be depended upon to give the right kind of answers. If you are examined by the committee, do not answer any questions you think might be harmful to our interests. The company will protect you. The company has mailed a spirited letter to each individual employee. If you know of any unsatisfactory condition in company camps or barracks, see that it is eliminated at once.

"(Signed) THE PITTSBURGH COAL CO."

And

Whereas the Senate of the United States has condemned the expense of $786,934 in behalf of WILLIAM S. VARE in a recent election contest in Pennsylvania, and yet in the same contest $1,804,979 was expended in behalf of another candidate; and

Whereas Andrew W. Mellon was a large contributor to this campaign, was a participant as a speaker, and defended contributions to this campaign on the ground that they were like unto contributions to a church; and

Whereas section 243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States makes it a criminal offense for "any person appointed to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury" to be "directly or indirectly concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce"; and

Whereas Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, is a stockholder and therefore is "directly and indirectly interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce" in corporations such as Gulf Oil Corporation, Gulf Refining Corporation, Gulf Production Co., Gulf Pipeline Co., Gulf Refining Co. of Louisiana, Gypsy Oil Co., Gulf Pipeline Co. of Oklahoma, Mexican Gulf Oil Co., Southern American Gulf Oil Co., Panama Gulf Oil Co., Aluminum Co. of America, and other corporations named by former Senator Ernst in a speech prepared in the Treasury Department and as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 14, 1925; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States in the only analogous case of record declared that the Secretary of the Treasury could not be financially interested in trade or commerce; and

Whereas the Government of the United States was defrauded out of $91,000 in the tax case of the Mellon National Bank, the Union Trust Co., and the Union Savings Bank while Andrew W. Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury; and

Whereas Andrew W. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, benefited through indefensible decisions in the tax case of the Gulf Oil Co., as disclosed by the select committee of the Senate appointed to investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue; and

Whereas there was much evidence of corruption, favoritism, violation of the law, and illegal settlements with certain large taxpayers reported by the select committee of the Senate appointed to investigate the Internal Revenue Bureau; and

Whereas Andrew W. Mellon was responsible for this condition; and

Whereas throughout all of the administration of said Andrew W. Mellon there runs an indifference to the law, a contempt for the law, a defiance of law; and

Whereas an indifference to law, a defiance of law, and contempt for law upon the part of those sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States breeds and encourages indifference and disrespect for law upon the part of other employees of the Government and upon the part of citizens and thereby contributes to and does undermine and eventually will destroy the Government of the United States; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States has confirmed the appointment of Andrew W. Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury, and to that extent has assumed responsibility for him: Therefore be it Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Andrew W. Mellon should resign as Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the subject of this resolution has been before the Senate in some of its aspects on several occasions. The last time, as I recall, when the subject matter of Mr. Mellon being Secretary of the Treasury came before the Senate was about four years ago in connection with a resolution introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Since that time I do not recall that the subject has arisen. Later developments, however, since that time suggested the introduction of the resolution, and with the resolution I coupled other issues raised as to his fitness and competency to hold the position of Secretary of the Treasury.

It is, of course, not necessary to make any specific reference to the work of the Senate in its investigation of the disposition of our naval oil reserves. Every Senator has had opportunity, through the press and otherwise, to be informed of what has developed since the Senate started in October, 1923, to investigate this matter. I think I may say with absolute confidence and without any fear of contradiction that the disclosures over this period of time have shown up the worst trail of fraud and corruption in public life since the achievement of our independence.

In November, 1923, and for some time thereafter, the evidence now before the Public Lands Committee shows that at least $160,000 of Liberty bonds received from Harry F. Sinclair were offered to prominent Republicans. As early as November, 1923, Andrew W. Mellon was sent $50,000 of those bonds. After receiving those bonds he kept them for some days, during which time Chairman Hays called on Mr. Mellon to ask him to take those bonds in exchange for cash. Naturally, with an available market for such high-class securities, the question would arise as to why they had to be peddled in that way. In other words, why could they not have been sold and the cash turned into the Republican National Committee's treasury?

However, to do this would have shown plainly on the face of the transaction where the money came from and would have raised the question as to what Sinclair got in return. This must be covered up at all hazards and by every effort. Therefore, Mr. Mellon was appealed to to aid in covering up this fraud and corruption. It was, of course, explained to him and, after hearing the explanation, Mr. Mellon declined to take the bonds in exchange for cash and have the exchange appear as a contribution to the liquidation of the Republican National Committee's debt for the 1920 campaign.

Knowing that this fraudulent scheme was being perpetrated upon the Republican Party, Mr. Mellon made no statement concerning it. Ample opportunity existed to present this information to the Public Lands Committee. However, year after year went by, with all the disclosures of fraud, and not one word from Mr. Mellon. Death was the only opportunity offered, apparently, to get at Mr. Mellon's connection with this matter. Mr. Pratt had died, but when his memoranda and files were presented to the Public Lands Committee a simple memorandum on a card disclosed the name "Andy." It is safe to assume that if Mr. Pratt had not written the word "Andy" on that card the connection of Mr. Mellon with the fraudulent scheme would never have been disclosed.

When this was disclosed, without any reference to who "Andy" might be, the committee called Mr. V. E. Hommel, cashier of Charles Pratt & Co., of New York City. On page 1469 of the transcript of the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands, Saturday, March 10, 1928, appears the testimony of Mr. Hommel. Mr. Hommel was shown two small memoranda taken from Mr. Pratt's personal files, and on page 1478 of the record testifies:

The CHAIRMAN. Take that first notation on the slip there and see if you can not translate it for us. The first one is "Weeks"; that is clear enough.

Mr. HOMMEL. "Weeks"; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the next one?

Mr. HOMMEL. I am trying to read it; see if that is "Candy."

The CHAIRMAN. Candy?

Mr. HOMMEL. That is what it looks like.

The CHAIRMAN. Might it not be Andy?

Mr. HOMMEL. Possibly.

This was the first public suggestion that connected the name of Andrew W. Mellon with Teapot Dome.

Mr. Mellon was subpœnaed on March 13 and appeared. He told his story, and, on page 1491 of the transcript of the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, we get an interesting glimpse of the story. I read from the testimony:

Senator WALSH. What explanation did Mr. Hays make of his possessions of the bonds?

Mr. MELLON. They had been subscribed or loaned, I think he said. I do not think he mentioned an amount—

I wish to emphasize what follows—

but I had the information or knew that it was a large amount—

I draw attention to the fact when Mr. Hays approached him on this subject he said he already had the information as to the source of the bonds and it was a large amount.

Continuing the quotation:

but I had no fixed amount, but in my mind it was something approaching $300,000, or something about there. I have heard so much of all this that it is a little bit difficult to go back that long, and especially when I have not been having any responsibility in connection with it, not with the committee.

I wish to point out he said he has had no connection with the committee, but he did not say he had no connection outside of the committee.

Continuing the quotation:

It is rather difficult to remember exactly, but it was something in that direction. He wanted to use some of the bonds—he wanted to use them in this way and have the record of the party show not a large subscription, and, besides that, he wanted to use some of the bonds and return them later. That is about as nearly as I can recall what was said.

Mr. Mellon also testified, as shown on page 1489 of the hearings before the Public Lands Committee:

When I became Secretary of the Treasury, the only amount contributed then had been the $2,000. As an explanation for that, in the early part of the campaign Mr. Hays called me on the long-distance telephone from New York and asked me to invite to a luncheon or dinner some of the leading business people, and that he and Mr. Boyce Thompson—

At this point I wish to emphasize the later relations of Mr. Boyce Thompson with the Treasury Department—would come out to Pittsburgh and explain the proposition they had for raising money for the campaign, which was to be limited subscriptions: that is, $2,000 as a maximum, $1,000 to be subscribed before the nominating convention and $1,000 for the campaign afterwards.

I had had no connection with the national committee nor with national political affairs at that time. Of course I had not in contemplation ever going into public office, but I was called likely because I was the leading banker of Pittsburgh.

Then, continuing to quote from the record Senator WALSH said:

What I would like to learn, Mr. Secretary, is what Mr. Hays told you about where he got the bonds and from whom he got them.

Mr. MELLON. Oh, from Mr. Sinclair.

Senator WALSH. What is that?

Mr. MELLON. From Mr. Sinclair.

There are now going on hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee, under authority of Senate Resolution 105, to investigate the conditions in certain bituminous coal fields. That investigation has disclosed a condition known by very few of the people of the United States—a condition of crime, brutality, degradation, starvation, and every known violation against the moral code, existing within a few miles of the Capitol in the coal fields of Pennsylvania, in which the dominant operator is the Pittsburgh Coal Co.

The testimony of William G. Warden, chairman of the board of directors of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., taken Friday, March 8, 1928, throws some light on Secretary Mellon's connection with the company. I read from the testimony on page 466:

Senator WHEELER. How much stock does Mr. Mellon own?

Mr. WARDEN. That I do not know. We are having our stock list prepared and it will be down here, which will answer that question.

Senator WHEELER. Secretary Mellon was a director of the company up until the time he became Secretary of the Treasury, was he not?

Mr. WARDEN. Yes.

Senator WHEELER. Do you know whether he owns any stock in the company now?

Mr. WARDEN. I think he does.

Senator WHEELER. The Mellon interests have been looked upon as a dominating interest in this company, have they?

Mr. WARDEN. According to gossip, but not in reality. The directors have been directing this company.

Senator WHEELER. Who handled that bond issue that was spoken of?

Mr. WARDEN. Do you mean the first one I mentioned?

Senator WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. WARDEN. I think it was the Union Trust.

Senator WHEELER. That is a Mellon bank?

Mr. WARDEN. It is supposed to be.

On page 1197 of the transcript of the testimony appears an order presented to the committee by H. T. Brundidge. I might say in this connection that, as I remember, Mr. Brundidge is a reporter for the St. Louis Star. He presented an order to the committee which reads as follows:

To all mine superintendents:

The United States Senate investigating committee is now visiting the Pittsburgh district. Clean up all unsightly conditions. Keep our police in the background. Avoid all arrests. Instruct our men to keep out of trouble. If the committee desires to question any of our employees see to it that you present men you can trust and who can be depended upon to give the right kind of answers. If you are examined by the committee do not answer any questions you think might be harmful to our interests. The company will protect you. The company has mailed a spirited letter to each individual employee. If you know of any unsatisfactory condition in company camps or barracks see that it is eliminated at once.

(Signed) THE PITTSBURGH COAL CO.

In that connection I might say that I saw in the morning press that the Pittsburgh Coal Co. has denied the authenticity of that order, but no officer of the company has denied it before the Interstate Commerce Committee, so far as I know. I confess I have not been there every minute, but I have been there nearly every minute when the committee has been in session.

At the time it was also stated that the Pittsburgh Coal Co. officials, their counsel who was there, and the chairman of their board, said that they had had no opportunity of seeing the order as presented to the committee. I was present when the order was laid before the committee; it was passed all around the table; every Senator had an opportunity to read it; and counsel for every interested party has been privileged under the rules of the committee to ask any questions that they chose of any witness.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Counsel made the statement before the committee that the order was a forgery and that they would adduce testimony so to prove.

Mr. COUZENS. When did he make that statement?

Mr. FESS. Two or three days ago. I think the statement was made by Mr. Rose.

Mr. COUZENS. As I said, I may have been absent at that very moment, but nothing of that kind was said while I was present.

The Senate on December 9, 1927, declared that it would not seat WILLIAM S. VARE and condemned the expenditure of some $786,000 spent in behalf of his election. I want to say at this time that it does seem to me absurd for the Senate to set such high standards for itself and for its Members, and yet continue in high office men who are much more culpable, so far as election expenses are concerned, than Mr. VARE. I would not say that in connection with Mr. SMITH, because the source of his campaign funds was so objectionable to good sense and decency that in my judgment it is not comparable to the case of Mr. VARE. Yet after the Senate had declined to seat Mr. VARE, after a valiant fight by my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], I want to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the testimony before the so-called Reed of Missouri committee to investigate election expenses disclosed the following, according to the partial report of the committee, Report 1197, part 2, December 22, 1926.

Pepper-Fisher expenditures, $1,804,979.

The Mellon family contributed and acknowledged the sum of $75,000, as follows:

Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, $25,000.
R. B. Mellon, his brother, $25,000.
W. L. Mellon, his nephew, $22,000 cash and an obligation of $3,000—$25,000.

Some comment has been made that Mr. Mellon did not participate in this campaign. I hold a photostat copy of the New York Times of May 15, 1926, in which it says:

Mellon speaks in aid of Pepper. Secretary urges renomination of Senator as indorsement of Coolidge régime.

I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate to read this entire article; but there are several paragraphs in Mr. Mellon's speech which I think might be drawn to the attention of the Senate.

First, I desire to point out that this article says:

To-night's meeting, the climax of many weeks of preparation, was the crowning effort of the Mellon-Pepper-Fisher campaign in western Pennsylvania. The great crowd which surged about Motor Square Garden was drawn from all sections of western Pennsylvania. So, in order that those who could not be present might hear what was said, the speeches were broadcast through amplifiers. Beatty Street and Center Avenue were roped off and the inclosure contained a greater multitude than did the big hall.

In Mr. Mellon's speech at this meeting he says—and this is important because of typifying the loyalty of Pennsylvanians to Pennsylvanians:

I am deeply interested in this primary campaign. I am concerned, first of all, in having an honest and efficient State administration, devoted to sound principles of government, and I am also interested from the national viewpoint because of the peculiar and important position which Pennsylvania has always occupied in the politics and Government of the Nation.

Continuing, he said:

The issues of this campaign are far above the personal ambitions of the various candidates for office and far above any single piece of legislation. This election will not only decide the character of government which we shall have in Pennsylvania for the next four years—

And I stop for a moment to direct the Senate's attention to the testimony now being taken before the Interstate Commerce Committee, showing the kind of administration that Pennsylvania is getting from the Mellon-Pepper-Fisher organization.

This election will not only decide the character of Government which we shall have in Pennsylvania for the next four years, but it will determine also whether the State shall continue to be strongly represented in the Senate of the United States.

Further, he says:

Pennsylvania never had a more faithful public official, nor one who has more clearly earned renomination. We Pennsylvanians have the reputation of being loyal to our public officials who are loyal to us. I can not urge you too strongly, therefore, to work and vote for Senator Pepper.

Those are quotations from the article to which I refer.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. Just for a question.

Mr. EDGE. That is all. I was rather interested and curious to know just what exception the Senator took to the statements in the speech he has read.

Mr. COUZENS. I took no exception to the statements. I am just showing the connection of Mr. Mellon with the Mellon-Pepper-Fisher campaign, to show that he spent nearly $2,000,000, and yet we condemn another candidate who spent less than $800,000.

Section 243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States says:

No person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, or First Comptroller, or First Auditor, or Treasurer, or Register shall directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel, or purchase by himself, or another in trust for him, any public lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State, or of the United States, or take or apply to his own use any emolument or gain for negotiating or transacting any business in the Treasury Department, other than what shall be allowed by law; and every person who offends against any of the prohibitions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor and forfeit to the United States the penalty of $3,000, and shall upon conviction be removed from office, and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States; and if any other person than the public prosecutor shall give information of any such offense, upon which a prosecution and conviction shall be had, one-half the aforesaid penalty of $3,000, when recovered, shall be for the use of the person giving such information.

In this connection I desire to point out that on March 14, 1925, former Senator Ernst, of Kentucky, in a speech prepared in the Treasury Department, page 217 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-ninth Congress, special session, March 14, 1925, listed the following corporations as so-called Mellon enterprises.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator has asserted that the speech was prepared in the Treasury Department. Has he evidence to that effect?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I have evidence to that effect.

Mr. MOSES. Will that be brought out in the course of the Senator's remarks?

Mr. COUZENS. I think so; yes.

The corporations are as follows:

The Gulf Oil Corporation.
The Gulf Refining Co.
The Gulf Production Co.
The Gulf Pipeline Co.
The Gulf Refining Co. of Louisiana.
The Gypsy Oil Co.
The Gulf Pipeline Co. of Oklahoma.
The Mexican Gulf Oil Co.
The South American Gulf Oil Co.
The Panama Gulf Oil Co.
The Gulf Cooperage Co.
The Gulf Commissary Co.
The Standard Steel Car Co.
The Middleton Car Co.
The Baltimore Car & Foundry Co.
The Verona Steel Castings Co.
The Forged Steel Wheel Co.
The Steel Car Forge Co.
The Butler Bolt & Rivet Co.
The Butler Carwheel Co.
The Lyndora Land & Improvement Co.
The Mellon National Bank.
The Union Trust Co.
The Union Savings Bank.
Aluminum Co. of America.
Aluminum Cooking Utensils Co.
Aluminum Die Casting Corporation.
The Aluminum Ore Co.
The Aluminum Seal Co.
The Electric Carbon Co.
The Knoxville Power Co.
The St. Lawrence River Power Co.
The St. Lawrence Securities Co.
The Tallahassee Power Co.
McClintic-Marshall Co.
Union Shipbuilding Co.
Carborundum Co.
The Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.

This record is made by former Senator Ernst, who was a great defender of the Secretary, and so I have not attempted to check him up; but I assume he was correct, because he said, in response to a question from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that these were all Mellon companies.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, did the Senator mention the date of the law which he has quoted as disqualifying a man engaged in business from being Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. COUZENS. I think it was somewhere about 1869. I have not the exact date.

Mr. EDGE. Eighteen hundred and sixty-nine?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it was originally passed in 1789, and is now section 243 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. EDGE. That was my recollection.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, is the Senator about to depart from that portion of his remarks dealing with the statute of 1869, or whatever date it is?

Mr. COUZENS. No; I am not quite ready to depart from that yet. I will listen to the Senator later on if he desires.

Evidently, then, the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned and interested in carrying on the business of trade and commerce, which is prohibited by section 243 of the Revised Statutes.

This same question came up during the administration of President Grant, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first session of the Forty-first Congress, 1869. President Grant nominated Alexander T. Stewart to be Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate confirmed the nomination; and in that connection I may say that so far as I can find, the only business of trade or commerce that Mr. Stewart had was the running of a department store. I am not absolutely sure of that, however.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that is quite true. The question in connection with Mr. Stewart arose from the fact that Mr. Stewart, in the conduct of his business, was an importer. The Senator undoubtedly is going to refer to another case which occurred later, the appointment of Mr. Franklin MacVeagh, who was also engaged in commercial business in the city of Chicago, and against whom the same objection was raised.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes. That was not nearly so violent an objection as dealing with your own income-tax returns. The mere importation of goods is not nearly so subject to venal action as dealing with your own income-tax returns and the income-tax returns of all of these 38 or 40 corporations which had to report to Mr. Mellon.

Mr. MOSES. Then the Senator's position is that no Secretary of the Treasury should be named who has any income aside from his salary?

Mr. COUZENS. I will deal with that at some other time. There are lots of men who can be secured who have incomes that would not be in conflict with the statute, or in violation of good business ethics.

Mr. MOSES. Perhaps the Senator himself is in that category.

Mr. COUZENS. No; I am not a candidate for the Secretary of the Treasuryship, and I doubt if I would be eligible if I were a candidate.

I referred to the case of Alexander T. Stewart. On March 6, 1869, a few days later, as shown by the RECORD, page 22, President Grant sent a message to the Senate in which he said:

> Since the nomination and confirmation of Alexander T. Stewart to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, I find that by the eighth section of the act of Congress approved September 2, 1789, it is provided as follows, to wit.

President Grant then quotes the entire section which I have just quoted. Then he concludes with another paragraph, as follows:

> In view of these provisions and the fact that Mr. Stewart has been unanimously confirmed by the Senate, I would ask that he be exempted by joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress from the operations of the same.

That was a message from President Grant.

The RECORD then proceeds:

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill, which of course will have to go over if there is any objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message of the President is before the Senate and it must be disposed of before there can be any other action.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the message be laid on the table, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, asks unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce the bill (S. No. 34) relating to the Secretary of the Treasury, which was read twice by its title.

Then Senator Trumbull and others said:

Let the bill be read at length.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported by the Secretary in full.

The Secretary read the bill, which proposes to repeal so much of the act approved September 2, 1789, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," as prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from being concerned in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, and to provide that in no case shall he act on any matter, claim, or account in which he is personally interested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at the present time.

Mr. SUMNER. I object. I think that it ought to be most profoundly considered before it is acted upon by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill is not before the body.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate having refused to act, President Grant, on March 9, as shown on page 34 of the RECORD, sent the following message to the Senate:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to request to be permitted to withdraw from the Senate of the United States my message of the 6th instant, requesting the passage of a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress to relieve the Secretary of the Treasury from the disabilities imposed by section 8 of the act of Congress approved September 2, 1789.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1869.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the request of the President be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

We find the next reference on page 61 of the RECORD when on March 15, 1869, Senator Trumbull reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary Senate bill 34, the bill which would have repealed the law relative to the Secretary of the Treasury being interested or concerned in trade or commerce.

Senator Trumbull reported that the committee had instructed him to recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The bill was killed, therefore.

There is no additional record of the action of the Senate, but the brief record there is shows plainly that the Senate did not consider with favor the proposal to permit a man interested in trade or commerce to be Secretary of the Treasury.

President Grant was not permitted to appoint Mr. Stewart, and Stewart resigned immediately, and George S. Boutwell was appointed Secretary of the Treasury.

In the opinion prepared by Faust & Wilson, attorneys, wherein they attempted to justify Mr. Mellon being Secretary of the Treasury and a stockholder in trade and commerce at the same time, these attorneys say with reference to the Stewart case:

> Mr. Stewart in an effort to meet the inhibition of the statute offered to convey his entire business to trustees or to retire from it altogether, but this was not considered as meeting the prohibition imposed.

This opinion is reported on page 5247 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-eighth Congress, first session.

So in the only case on record the Senate of the United States held that the Secretary of the Treasury could not be interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce even if, after his appointment as Secretary, he turned the entire business over to a trustee or retired from it altogether.

This is the only case on record that we can find.

In this connection I desire to point out where the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] referred to a trusteeship of interest in the Overholt Whisky Co. being held in trust, so that when finally disposed of the results would go to Mr. Mellon, so that in effect it is an example of what the Senate at that time thought was bad policy, namely, that property should be turned over in trust to somebody else for the benefit of the party making the trust.

Certainly Mr. Stewart was in better position to request the Senate to be permitted to continue as secretary, when he turned over all his business and retired, than is Mr. Mellon, who remains a stockholder in many corporations.

In the Mellon National Bank, Union Trust Co., and Union Savings Bank—all of Pittsburgh—tax cases, shown on page 3979 of the record of hearings of the Select Committee on Investigation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, Sixty-eighth Congress, it is shown that the companies first presented, through their attorney, Mr. Seifert, a consolidated tax return.

I think Mr. Seifert is a partner of the Senator from Pennsylvania. If I am in error in that, he can correct me.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not in matters in which the Government is interested.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator says he is a partner of his, but not in matters dealing with the Government.

Some days later Mr. Seifert withdrew this return and presented a return in which it was contended the companies were not consolidated. This return was finally approved. Mr. Seifert contended and the bureau approved the contention that a bank and a trust company were not in a closely related line of business, and therefore could not be forced to consolidate. By this decision the Government lost $91,472.37.

Commenting upon this decision, Senator REED of Pennsylvania, on February 1, 1926, page 3096 of the RECORD, said:

> The truth is, and this I say of my own knowledge, that the Union Trust Co., of Pittsburgh, owned every share of the stock of the Union Savings Bank, except the qualifying shares of the directors. It also owned every share of stock of the Mellon National Bank, except the qualifying shares of the directors. In every sense those corporations are one enterprise. They were exactly what Congress meant to provide for when it provided for consolidated returns. I can not imagine any justice in treating them otherwise than as consolidated. * * * As long as we are going to have a system of consolidated returns we can not get a more obvious case of unification of corporations than exists in that case.

I think everyone will agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania. The attorney in the case, Mr. Seifert, agreed with him and with the select committee. He presented his case as a consolidated return. When they afterwards found that by separating the returns and making three separate returns they would save between ninety and ninety-five thousand dollars, they changed their position and said that they were not consolidated and therefore should not be compelled to consolidate the returns; and they got away with it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COUZENS. For a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Pursuing that course, has the Senator any idea about how much money was lost to the Government? In other words, how much money did the Government lose by such transactions?

Mr. COUZENS. I have not any estimate at all. The figures are so enormous that there is no way of computing them without a thorough investigation. Any figure would be a guess.

Mr. HEFLIN. It was an enormous amount?

Mr. COUZENS. There is no question about it. The report of the select committee made to the Senate indicated that very clearly, and without any argument or attention being paid to it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The report showed it was $91,000, did it not?

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Alabama asks about other cases, how much the Treasury was affected, and I said that was not computable.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. For a question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator concluded his statement a moment ago by saying "and they got away with it"; that is, after they contended that they should make separate returns. Just exactly what was the proceeding which enabled them to escape from the attitude which they had theretofore taken?

Mr. COUZENS. I understand—and I will have to look up the record to be absolutely sure—that they signed an agreement which is provided in the statute, that the case is forever closed. I think that is correct; that after they had gotten several viewpoints or decisions or conclusions by Treasury officials, they found out the one which would allow them to escape with the least amount of taxes, and got that ruling in the Treasury Department.

I think the Mellon National Bank and the other institutions could, without great violence to their financial standing, have refunded the Government some $91,000, but apparently they relied upon the fact that the case was closed, and that was the experience the select committee of the Senate had with respect to many, many cases that were just as illegally closed as this one was.

In the affidavit filed with the committee in this case it was stated that the man who first reviewed the case in the bureau refused to approve it. He took the case to the principal reviewer, one T. J. Enes, according to this affidavit, and Enes held up his finger and said, "Sh! Sign on the dotted line"; and he signed.

I just cite this case to show the menace of having as Secretary of the Treasury a man who is known to be greatly interested in business, and especially in these days, when tax cases affecting his business must come before the department.

When this statute to which I have referred was passed we had no such thing as income-tax returns. We had no process of collecting from one and two billion dollars a year from our taxpayers under laws of secrecy.

Several attempts have been made in the Senate, led by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to have those records made public records. That does not mean that they have to be taken out of the files of the Treasury Department and published in all the newspapers. It means that the records may be accessible to a person properly entitled to see them, and I want to say here, without fear of contradiction, that hundreds of millions of dollars have been lost to the Government of the United States through the very fact that these cases may be closed and forever obscured from public observation or checking. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who sat through these committee hearings, can vouch that these statements are accurate.

I could cite any number of additional cases showing the condition in the Bureau of Internal Revenue when the investigation was made. There were some eight volumes of testimony, but I know that Senators have not time to read the testimony, so that unless Senators really take a conscientious, earnest interest in these committee investigations nothing comes out of them. That is one of the troubles with the Senate organization, that we have too many committees, and there is a "buck passing" between Senators to see that these things that are dug up in the investigation get some concrete consideration and possibly legislation to correct them.

For example, there was the William Boyce Thompson case. He was the treasurer of the Republican National Committee. I see that the Senator occupying the chair [Mr. MOSES], who is fully familiar with all these facts, I assume, shakes his head, indicating that Thompson was not treasurer of the Republican National Committee. He was treasurer of some Republican committee. So long as the present occupant of the chair is so familiar with all of these transactions, I would be glad if he would enlighten the Senate when he gets out of the chair.

This William Boyce Thompson was one of the men whom Mr. Hays asked Mr. Mellon to meet in Pittsburgh to prepare a plan to secure sufficient money for the campaign.

The record after that shows that this man Thompson was a partner, if I remember correctly, with another man in a lead mine. They sold the lead mine at an enormous profit during the war.

The partner reported his profits. William Boyce Thompson did not report his profits. When the bureau came to check up his partner's profits, they wondered what became of the other half, and they found that Mr. Thompson had secured the other half of the profits. Communications took place between the Treasury Department and William Boyce Thompson, and they finally assessed him approximately a half million dollars more than they had theretofore assessed him. What happened? Thompson came down to the Treasury Department, went into secret conference with a man by the name of Alexander, and settled his tax case for $462. I can not say, but I hope I have imagination enough to know why he got that kind of treatment. I think that the Senate has imagination enough to know why he got that kind of treatment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. How much did the partner receiving the other half pay?

Mr. COUZENS. The record will show. I do not have the figures at hand. I do not know whether the amounts were exactly the same. There was a sliding scale of income, and what might apply to one might not apply to another, because of the incomes being added.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, the force of the statement of the Senator, it seems to me, would be more fully realized if we knew just what the partner, who received his half and regularly paid his income tax, had paid as compared to what the Senator is now alleging Thompson paid.

Mr. COUZENS. It is hardly comparable because the total income from every source is added, and while I might pay more on a certain transaction than the Senator would, in which we were equally interested, yet his income might be greater or less than mine. One can not make a satisfactory comparison because of the graduated scale of income taxes.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator let me finish this statement? I am getting tired.

Mr. MOSES. I wanted to refer to the subject to which the Senator referred while I was marooned in the chair.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator can go on when I finish.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator yield to me for a few questions when he finishes his prepared speech?

Mr. COUZENS. I have no objection to any questions at all.

As I said, I can refer to records in the hearings before the select committee of the Senate which investigated the Internal Revenue Bureau showing the enormous losses to the Government or prospective losses, and I say that advisedly, because I do not know now how those cases were finally settled. There were millions of dollars involved in the cases of the United States Steel Corporation, in the Aluminum Co. of America, in the Standard Steel Car Co., and many other cases, though I do not know now how they have been settled.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COUZENS. No one will ever be able to know unless the Senate goes into those specific cases to determine to what extent the Government has, to use a vulgar expression, been "gypped" by this procedure.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. COUZENS. When I get through. I will finish this statement first.

There is no question about who is responsible for the condition in the Treasury Department. There is no question about who is responsible for the Internal Revenue Bureau, which, after all these years, is still in an unfortunate condition. There are still cases which I am convinced will show inaccurate and unlawful settlements, and I say that we have no way of getting at the facts. The records are private. Any kind of settlement that Mr. Mellon wants to make, he can make with anybody, honest or dishonest, and I am not saying whether he has given any dishonest instructions. I do not charge that. I point out the possibilities. All he has to do is to tell Mr. Blair how to settle a case and it is settled that way.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question right at that point?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes. I am tired, but I will yield.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator know of any instance in which the Secretary of the Treasury has ever told the Commissioner of Internal Revenue how to settle a case?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator be good enough to cite them?

Mr. COUZENS. I can not cite them. I would have to look over the records. I want to point out in this connection that, perhaps, it would be difficult to point out the date and the hour, but in the record there was a statement of a memorandum signed by the Undersecretary of the Treasury, Mr. Winston, in connection with three or four Chicago cases, in which he said, "These men are friends of mine."

Mr. MOSES. Of whom?

Mr. COUZENS. Of Mr. Winston, and "therefore be considerate of them," or something to that effect. I will find the record if the Senator is interested.

Mr. MOSES. Were Mellon and Winston one and the same?

Mr. COUZENS. Just a minute. I am going to lead up to it. There were memoranda attached to cases in the Treasury Department, "This is a Mellon company, and the figures are not to be disturbed," or some such thing. I am trying to remember these after several years since we went into the matters. If the Senator is interested in anything else, then I will get the record and put the exact statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at some other time.

Mr. MOSES. I am trying to get at the facts.

Mr. COUZENS. I will give the facts.

Mr. MOSES. These memoranda, if they are like memoranda in the usual course of business in an executive department, carried initials. Were those initials "A. W. M."?

Mr. COUZENS. I think I will have to look that up. I can not recall those things.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator certainly would recall those initials if they ever appeared?

Mr. COUZENS. No; I would not. There were a lot of initials concerned. I want to point out to the Senator from New Hampshire that whether he gave specific instructions that I can find or not, is not material.

Mr. MOSES. Why not? The Senator is trying to get him removed.

Mr. COUZENS. Because I think he is holding the office illegally under the statute.

Mr. MOSES. Why not proceed to impeach him, and get some Member of the House to move in that way?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not have any connection with the House, and I do not have to accept any instructions from the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Certainly, nor from anybody else, and the Senator does not. I understand that perfectly well. I am merely suggesting an orderly procedure.

Mr. COUZENS. If this is a disorderly procedure, the Senator can prescribe his own procedure, and he can do as he pleases. I am not interested in what the Senator from New Hampshire believes or what any other Senator believes.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from New Hampshire certainly will follow his own course.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, I know that. I am not trying to dictate his course.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan permit me to make a suggestion right there?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the Senator is now proceeding in an orderly way to get Mr. Mellon out of the office of Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Alabama will amplify that statement before the debate closes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will probably have something to say on the subject for the edification of the Senator from New Hampshire. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOSES. And for the country at large.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; for the country at large.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not going to take much more of the time of the Senate. I want to point out that a condition has existed in the Treasury Department for six or seven years which could not have existed in any private industry in the world. There is not a corporation, from the smallest to the largest that I know of, that would let a traveling man or a cashier pass upon his own cases and approve his own expenditures and his own balance sheet.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator referred to Mr. Winston making a notation that "these are friends of ours." That, of itself, might create some suspicion; but I recall that very recently I sent a note to Commissioner Blair introducing some one and saying, "This is a particular friend of mine, and I hope you will give him a hearing." There certainly was no suggestion of anything that was out of order in that. I have done it often.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator had been the superior of Mr. Blair, I should say it would be wrong, but he did not happen to be a superior officer over Mr. Blair. I was commenting on the fact that a superior officer gave such a memorandum to a subordinate, and it is not comparable to the case referred to by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The Senator would insinuate then that it was in order to do a thing that ought not to have been permitted?

Mr. COUZENS. I say the Senator can draw his own inference. I am not drawing any inferences. I have my own views about the way of honestly doing business.

Mr. FESS. My inference is that that does not necessarily carry with it anything of moral turpitude at all, and there is no Senator here who has not been guilty of that sort of thing, if that is guilt.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not referring to Senators. The Senator from Ohio may have any moral standard he desires. He has confessed on the floor of the Senate that he did not tell the truth, so that if he has a moral standard of that kind he can have it. That is not my standard of business morals or any other kind of morals.

Mr. FESS. The question about not telling the truth——

Mr. COUZENS. The RECORD shows it and at least the Senate will remember it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a statement?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. That was in reference to an article which was written by Mr. Oulahan. Mr. Oulahan is the chief reporter of the New York Times. I have seen him and have met him once or twice. I never had an interview with him in my life, but I had an interview with one of the New York Times men, and Mr. Oulahan on the Sunday following the interview wrote a running comment on the matter. He made statements there that he probably was justified in getting from the under man, but I had never said anything of that sort.

When the matter came up on the floor of the Senate I made the statement that I said to the reporter at the White House that I found that the President was displeased with what I was stating in regard to drafting him this year.

I made the statement that I said that in order to make sure that it would get across and the President would not be under the responsibility of having it charged that I was speaking for him. I said again that when I said that the President was displeased I had no evidence that he was displeased, but my purpose was to get it to the country, to avoid the President being under the charge that I was talking for him. If that is moral turpitude, let the Senator so regard it.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to say that in order to get it across the Senator stated that he said something that he did not say.

Mr. FESS. I just now made that statement.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to say that Mr. Winston probably said to Mr. Blair something that he intended to get across and without giving specific instructions.

The Internal Revenue Bureau reeks with that sort of thing. Hundreds of men have gone out of that bureau tainted with fraud. There is an accountancy firm by the name of Ernst & Ernst who have rewritten the books of many corporations to enable the books to read so that the corporations pay the least possible tax. If my memory serves me correctly that was done in the Gulf Oil case. I do know that charges were preferred in the Bureau of Internal Revenue against Ernst & Ernst for their culpable and dishonest and disreputable methods. I know that the case stood there for months and possibly years, and they are still practicing before the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

I mention these things to show what the possibilities are in that bureau under existing law. I do not care about any particular man. I do not care how wealthy he is or who he is. I believe the Congress of the United States should enact laws to prevent the possibility of those things. No matter who the man may be, no matter how honest he may be, it is reprehensible that conditions of this kind should exist year after year, and still continue to exist, and that no legislation should be enacted to attempt to remedy them.

The effort has been repeatedly made to make there records accessible, but no Member of Congress, no auditor, and no one else can walk in there and say, "I desire to see the returns of So-and-so" in order to ascertain whether the cases have been honestly determined. It is an undeniable fact, and the records so show, that case after case has been determined and settled on different interpretations of the law, under different rules and regulations, in some cases favorable to the taxpayer, sometimes unfavorable to him, sometimes unfavorable to the Government, and sometimes favorable to the Government.

I do not say that there is any direct act of conspiracy in the Treasury Department; I do not charge that; but I charge that the department is rotten with favoritism and corruption, and that hundreds of employees have left the department and mulcted taxpayers because of information they have secured in the department, and the department has made no attempt to prevent the taxpayers from being so mulcted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania obtained the floor.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will do so if I shall not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. MOSES. I do not want to take the Senator from Pennsylvania from the floor, but he will recall that at the time when I was marooned——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. When I was marooned and muzzled in the chair and undertook by a Homeric nodding of the head to correct some statements made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] in the course of his speech, which I suppose was prepared somewhere but certainly not in the Treasury Department, he took me to task for my gesture, and refused to permit me to make an explanation when I came down upon the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh no; I did not refuse to yield for an explanation, but I thought the Senator wanted to ask me a question. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MOSES. I said I was marooned in the chair and was not able to say what I wanted to say because the Senator would not permit me to say it. I am going to say it now without interruption from the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Proceed, sir.

Mr. MOSES. The knowledge of the Senator from Michigan of the history of American politics is somewhat nebulous, especially when he undertakes to say that William Boyce Thompson was ever the treasurer of the Republican National Committee. I say this with full knowledge and long acquaintance with Colonel Thompson, with whom I was contemporary in a preparatory school and whose career since has been thoroughly familiar to me. If the rest of the Senator's information is no more accurate than that, we may safely dispose of what he has had to say by paying no attention to it.

The fact is, Mr. President, that this is a private feud between the Senator from Michigan and the Secretary of the Treasury; it has gone on for many years; and, like the Irishman on the outside when a fight was going on in the hotel office, I am wondering whether I have any right to interfere in a private row; but since the Senator has seen fit to bring his grievances to the floor of the Senate in a recital, vicious, malicious, and, as I believe, untrue in most instances, I wish to say to him that I think a much more orderly procedure would have been for him to have found some enemy of the Secretary of the Treasury in the House of Representatives and to have proceeded in a constitutional manner to get the Secretary out of his place.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the resolution which the Senate is now considering contains 19 preambles or recitals, and it is with the assertions of fact in those that I want, as briefly as may be in my power, to deal. I believe that it will not be necessary to speak so long as the Senator from Michigan found it necessary to speak in advocacy of his resolution.

The first five of those recitals find fault with Secretary Mellon because he did not disclose the transaction of November, 1923, when he was asked to help to conceal a subscription by Sinclair to the Republican National Committee. The facts were brought out by the questioning of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and there can not be any dispute about them. In November, 1923, Mr. Will H. Hays, then chairman of the Republican National Committee, telephoned to Mr. Mellon, stating that he was sending him a package of valuable papers and that he would call later and explain about them. The package came; Mr. Mellon was busy. He did not open the package, but he set it off on a corner of his desk and forgot all about it. He did not know that it contained bonds at all; he forgot all about it, and went home, leaving it lying there open on his desk. When he came back the next morning he noticed it, and opened it, and was startled to find that it contained $50,000 of Liberty bonds of the first issue. He had no idea where it came from, except that it came from Hays, nor had he any idea what Hays wanted him to do with the bonds. Obviously they were valuable; he knew they did not belong to himself; and so he put them in the safe until Mr. Hays could——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Had Mr. Hays withdrawn from the Cabinet at that time?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think he had; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He was not then Postmaster General?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I believe not.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no; Mr. Hays withdrew from the Cabinet in 1922, after serving for about one year in the Post Office Department.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I assumed that he had retired from the Cabinet.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am quite sure he was living outside of Washington at the time. However, Mr. Mellon does not remember how long the bonds lay there in his safe. It may have been one day or it may have been three or four days, but within a few days Hays did come to his office and explain to him that Sinclair had made a large contribution in these bonds, or a loan—the term seems to be vague—had advanced the bonds to help pay off the Republican deficit from the campaign of 1920. I do not remember the exact words, but the substance of it is perfectly distinct. Hays asked Mellon to keep the $50,000 of bonds and to give him in exchange for them a check for $50,000, with the express or implied intention that they should appear on his accounts as a contribution from Mellon and not pro tanto from Sinclair. Mellon instantly and unhesitatingly refused to comply with the suggestion; he said he would have nothing to do with it. He offered the bonds to Hays then and there, but Hays said, "No"; he was going to Indiana and he did not want to carry them with him, and asked Mellon if he would not send the bonds to him—Hays—when Hays returned to New York. Mr. Mellon said he would do so at the first opportunity, and the first opportunity occurred when Parker Gilbert, now the Agent General of Reparations but then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, happened to be going to New York. Mellon gave Gilbert the bonds, and he took them back to Hays, and that ended the transaction.

Now it is suggested that Mr. Mellon ought then to have disclosed the fact that those were Continental Trading Co. bonds, contributed by Sinclair for a dishonest purpose. But, be it remembered, Mr. President, that nobody outside of the particular group of criminals connected with it knew that there was such a thing as the Continental Trading Co., or that the Continental Trading Co. had ever owned any bonds, or that Sinclair had ever had anything to do with it, or that he got some of the bonds from that company; nobody knew that. It was not possible to have disclosed it; nor do we know yet except by inference. Mr. Mellon naturally made no record of the number of the bonds, and while presumably they came from that wretched pile that had its origin in the Continental Trading Co., no man knows to this day, nor is there any way of finding out. So much for what Mr. Mellon did not do.

Now, let me tell the Senate and the country what Mr. Mellon did do in connection with the unearthing of Fall's treachery to his country and Sinclair's bribery of Fall. The inference, although not the direct statement of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], is that Mellon was trying to hide Sinclair's association with this transaction. The facts speak best for what Mr. Mellon was trying to do. We all remember the appointment of Mr. Roberts and former Senator Pomerene to represent the United States in recovering back the oil properties and punishing the criminals who had acquired them. We all remember, I think, that at the time those counsel were appointed not one man outside of the parties themselves had ever heard of the Continental Trading Co.; not a soul among us suspected even that Sinclair had given any bonds to Fall or that Sinclair had gotten the bonds from the Continental Trading Co.

The whole thing was shrouded in utter darkness so far as we and all other innocent Government officials knew. When those counsel were appointed they had to proceed against Doheny, and they had to proceed against Sinclair for the recovery of the oil properties that had been taken from the Government. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] demonstrated to our satisfaction the payment of money by Doheny to Fall. Nobody knew what had passed from Sinclair or whether anything had passed; at least that is my recollection, and I think I state it correctly. The counsel who were appointed had no particular difficulty in working up the case against Doheny, because the Public Lands Committee had done it for them, and they simply took over the witnesses that committee had questioned and the information the committee had elicited; but the Sinclair case, as I say, was shrouded in darkness.

The two counsel, Mr. Roberts and Mr. Pomerene, applied to the Secretary of the Treasury on March 26, 1924, for assistance from the Secret Service. It was easily possible, if one wanted to protect Sinclair or to hide some guilt on his part that was known of, to find four men in the Secret Service with such scant intelligence or experience or zeal that their investigation would have led to nothing; but this same Mr. Mellon who is denounced as trying to hide something and with being an accessory after the fact with Sinclair, had just been going through a most difficult examination in connection with the charges of some person that Liberty bonds had been issued in duplicate and that there had been great overissues. It required a most exhaustive and careful analysis of the Liberty-bond work of the country during the World War. It was proven, as we all remember, that in spite of the haste and pressure under which the Liberty bonds were issued in war time, there had been no overissue. The whole thing was cleared up I think to everybody's satisfaction.

The only guilt in the issuance of Liberty bonds during the war had been on the part of the numbering machine which every once in a while slipped its gears and made duplicate numbers; but the actual amount of bonds outstanding was just what we understood it to be. That investigation had been very difficult. It had been very capably handled by four Secret Service men in the department, and Mr. Mellon, in order that the inquiry into the Sinclair affair and the Fall business should be well done, picked out those experienced men to put on the job and to make a thorough investigation.

Let me tell the Senate how well they worked. They were assigned to that duty March 29, 1924. By the middle of April they had found that in a bank in a town called Carrizozo, N. Mex., there was a deposit of $50,000 of Liberty bonds standing to the credit of former Secretary Fall. They got the numbers of those bonds and hurried back here to Washington; and, starting back in 1917, when the bonds were issued, they followed those in every step and in every transaction that they had passed through down to the time in 1922 when finally they came into Fall's hands.

It is almost a romance to discover the path those bonds took. They were issued to the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta. They were sold by that bank to the Southland Steamship Co., a Savannah concern. That company sold them to the Savannah Bank & Trust Co., and they sold them to the Chase National Bank in New York, and they sold them to a firm of brokers in New York, a Wall Street firm, and they sold them to the Dominion Bank of Canada, and they sold them to a man named Osler; and there the trail seemed to end.

These men camped on Osler's trail, being lied to by him with his explanation of what he bought the bonds for; and when they finally learned the name of the Continental Trading Co., Osler lied again and said that it had been created to help dispose of an estate; but two of them were there by that time, and they stuck to the job until finally their suspicions were thoroughly aroused, and the special counsel that the President had appointed and we had ratified went to Toronto and joined them; and they put Mr. Osler on the grill and got enough out of him to discover that this Continental Trading Co. had something to do with Sinclair. He never mentioned Stewart or the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, but he did mention Sinclair and a man named Humphreys. Then they went after Humphreys, and through him found references to Stewart and Blackmer and O'Neil. Then Osler left for Africa, and Blackmer and O'Neil left for France, and they followed them across the ocean, and they finally located one of them living under an assumed name in Monte Carlo and helped to get service of process on him there in Monte Carlo. They traced the other one to some place in Czechoslovakia, and they think they will get him yet; and they found Stewart when Stewart was hiding to avoid the service of process in the case pending against him.

Those same Secret Service men later were asked to assist the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the committee with which he is working; and I believe that we have it on his authority that their support has been whole-hearted and loyal. The details of what they have done for that committee will be divulged in due time when the Senators in charge of that investigation think it wise to make it public. But how can we say, Mr. President, where he has rendered such loyal service as that in silence, claiming no credit for it, not holding himself up to the public as the inspirer of this successful search—how can we say, as the Senator from Michigan has implied, that Mr. Mellon is trying to protect Sinclair or Fall or any of their accomplices?

Now I pass to the next group of allegations in this resolution, and that can be briefly disposed of.

The sixth and seventh paragraphs recite that the Pittsburgh Coal Co. is a Mellon enterprise. With characteristic vagueness, the resolution does not say what Mellon, or to what extent, or how it is a Mellon enterprise, or what the Secretary of the Treasury has to do with it. Then the resolution recites this order which was read by the Senator from Michigan, addressed to mine superintendents, and instructing them in effect to suborn witnesses, to lie to the Senate subcommittee that went to western Pennsylvania last month.

To begin with, the Pittsburgh Coal Co. is not a Mellon enterprise. The Secretary of the Treasury and his brother do own some stock in it, but it is a minority. I understand it is less than 25 per cent. They do not control it. In the next place, no such order as that was issued by the Pittsburgh Coal Co. I am speaking now on information from them and on their testimony to the committee when finally they were allowed to put it in. No such order as that was ever issued by any person in the Pittsburgh Coal Co. to anybody else in the Pittsburgh Coal Co. When that letter was produced it was brought in by a reporter for a St. Louis paper, a reporter named Brundidge, who did, as the Senator from Michigan has said, hand it around to the members of the committee; but they refused to show it to the counsel for the coal company or anybody representing the coal company.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Wait a minute. I am going to bear this out.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is not going to bear that out.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator will find on page 1243 of the typewritten record where the Pittsburgh Coal Co. counsel asked to see a copy of it.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; but that is quite different. The Senator is not going to bear out the statement that the committee refused, or any member of the committee refused, to show it to them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Wait a minute.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me state just what happened.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let me state what I am told happened, and then the Senator can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to correct the Senator, because of the fact that he has made a statement that is incorrect.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. All right.

Mr. WHEELER. The statement I desire to make is this: Mr. Brundidge came into the committee room and testified that he understood that this paper was issued by the coal company. He bought it from a sergeant of the coal and iron police working for the Pittsburgh Coal Co. He passed it over to the stenographer, and it was read into the record, and everyone saw it; and it was supposedly a copy of a telegram, as I recall. The committee thought he had handed it to the stenographer. Mr. Brundidge left the stand. When he left the stand it seems that he took this paper with him. The coal company, after he had left the stand and after he had gone, asked the committee to see it. The committee could not hand it to counsel for the coal company because of the fact that we did not have it. We did not refuse to hand it to him.

Let me say to the Senator that this morning Mr. Brundidge called me up on the long-distance telephone from the St. Louis Star, one of the reputable newspapers of the country, and said that he had taken the paper with him because of the fact that it had been read into the record, but that he would be perfectly willing to produce it at any time and at any place that we desired. It is not fair to the committee to say that the committee refused to show it to the Pittsburgh Coal Co. or to any of their representatives.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This much is true, is it not—that this reporter produced the paper; it was not shown to the counsel for the company; they did make repeated requests to see it——

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The witness was allowed to leave town, taking it with him; it has never been brought back since; the committee did not require Brundidge to tell from whom he had bought it; and it was utterly impossible to cross-examine him, as I am told, on the source of it or the genuineness of it.

Mr. WHEELER. No; the Senator's information is incorrect in many particulars.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Very good.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Pittsburgh Coal Co. representatives have made those statements to the Senator they have made incorrect statements to him with reference to some of the matters. I will tell the Senator just exactly what took place.

The Pittsburgh Coal Co.'s attorneys had been in the room. They had requested permission to cross-examine, and had been told that they could cross-examine any witness who went upon the stand at any time at all. I am sorry that the chairman of the committee is not here to tell the Senator just exactly what occurred.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania, may I ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, indeed.

Mr. MOSES. Is it the practice of the committee investigating conditions in the Pennsylvania coal fields to permit exhibits before the committee to be taken away?

Mr. WHEELER. No; not at all. It was not intended by the committee that this paper should be taken away. It was simply a misunderstanding upon the part, as I take it, of a witness.

Let me say to the Senator that Mr. Brundidge—I am not from his State, and I do not know him, excepting, let me say, that he is a reputable newspaper man from the St. Louis Star——

Mr. MOSES. All newspaper men are reputable. I was one myself once.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I am willing to concede that the situation is exactly as the Senator from Montana expresses it. If I have been otherwise informed, I am willing to admit now that I have been incorrectly informed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I want, if I can, to stick to the important things. The important things about this matter are that the order is believed to be a forgery, an invention of somebody; that the Pittsburgh Coal Co. is not a Mellon concern; that Mr. Mellon never heard of the order, and nobody pretends he ever did, until it appeared in the papers; that Mr. Mellon has nothing to do with the management of the Pittsburgh Coal Co.; and I fail to see why the Senate should expel him from office because a company which he does not control did not issue an order which has been shown to be a forgery.

Mr. MOSES. I beg the Senator to stick to the important thing. The Senate can not expel Mr. Mellon from office except upon impeachment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. A statement was made a moment ago of which I think there ought to be a little verification.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; I beg the Senator not to waste time on the matter of this order.

Mr. FESS. As a matter of defense of the committee, I think there ought to be——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will not the Senator defend the committee after 2 o'clock, then? I am going to move to send this resolution to the Committee on Finance, and I do not want to try to postpone a vote until after 2 o'clock. If the Senator will permit me to hurry on——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I want to make a statement here.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then, as I have the floor, and the Senator wants to make a statement over my protest, I yield to him to do it.

Mr. FESS. I think I should do it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I may be permitted to say that I do not think we shall get through by 2 o'clock.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, with reference to the statement that the committee did not require the name of the person who sold this paper to Mr. Brundidge for $25, I desire to state that the committee did not feel like demanding the name when he asked to be excused. Another witness came on, a minister, and he referred to it, and he said that he did not care to give the name, and we excused him.

Mr. Rose, the counsel of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., however, made the statement that the paper was a forgery. Our committee then said that we would require the name of the parties that are concerned in it.

I do not want the Senator to think that I am a member of a committee that would excuse that sort of thing.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have not been in attendance on the committee, and I do not know of my own knowledge any of the facts that I have recited, except that it is insisted this is a forgery.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what time Mr. Rose advised the committee that it was a forgery? How long ago?

Mr. FESS. It was a day or two after it had been introduced as testimony.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Before this resolution was presented.

Mr. EDGE. Before this resolution was introduced by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. I draw attention to the fact that it is made a part of the resolution.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, preambles Nos. 8 and 9 refer to the fact that Secretary Mellon supported the election of Governor Fisher and of Senator Pepper, and that he contributed $25,000 of his own money, in good faith, openly, to the campaign fund for those two gentlemen and the other 8,000 candidates who were on the Republican slate. I doubt whether the Senate intends to condemn the frank contribution of $25,000 in a bitterly fought campaign, involving not only State but national issues, and I shall not waste any more time on that.

The next group of accusations occur in paragraphs 10, 11, and 12 of the resolution, which recite that section 243 of the Revised Statutes, which forbids the Secretary of the Treasury from owning ships or from carrying on any trade or business, was violated, and then recites that Mr. Mellon is a stockholder in 12 different companies. As a matter of fact, he is a stockholder in only 2 of those 12; 10 of the 12 are mere subsidiary companies in which he has no interest. He is not a director or an officer of any one of them. He has an investment in the stocks of these two companies and of many other companies, but he is not a director or manager or officer of any company or any business whatsoever.

It has been held in Stewart's case that to be the direct owner of a large dry-goods store, and to be engaged in carrying on that business, is a violation of the old act of 1789, and it would be hard to see why it should not be a violation. But perhaps it would be interesting to know just how this is applied to Secretary Mellon. Back in 1921, in the winter, when President-elect Harding asked Mr. Mellon to become Secretary of the Treasury, he accepted, after a considerable amount of reluctance. Then, having accepted, he repented his acceptance and looked for some way to be excused, and somebody told him of the existence of this old act of 1789 and this section of the Revised Statutes. Mr. Mellon called up Senator Knox down here in Washington and asked him to go directly to the President elect, Senator Harding, and tell him that he could not serve; that he was not eligible under this act, because he had a lot of these stocks and therefore would have to be omitted from consideration.

Senator Knox, very much concerned, called in Faust & Wilson, lawyers here in this city, and asked them at once to make a search and give an opinion, and that opinion has already appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I put it in on March 31, 1924, and it appears on page 5246 of the RECORD.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? Was that the occasion when another Member of this body had introduced a similar resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury to resign?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That was the time of another attack on Mr. Mellon, when there was a resolution similar to this.

Mr. EDGE. What was the disposition of that resolution?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not remember; but Mr. Mellon is still in the Cabinet.

At all events, the substance of that opinion was that a mere investment in stocks of a corporation, unaccompanied by any directorship or holding of office, was not the doing of business within the meaning of that section of the Revised Statutes or of that old act of 1789. The opinion cites a large number of authorities to that general effect, including a New York case, the case of Duell (111 N. Y. Supp. 969), in which it was held directly that a justice of the court of special sessions, who, by the New York law, is forbidden from carrying on any business—the same words we have in the Federal act—is not carrying on a business where he is a stockholder in a corporation engaged in the publishing business in the same city.

There is no decision to the contrary. Every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the phrase "carrying on business," including the decisions in the commodities cases, held that mere passive stockholding is not in any sense the carrying on of business of the corporation by the stockholder. I think most lawyers will agree that the distinction is well made.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Mellon was a director of some of these concerns when he was appointed to the Treasury, was he not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; he resigned a few days before he was appointed.

Mr. WHEELER. Just prior to his appointment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; and he disposed of all his bank stock, and all stocks that might conflict with the requirements of the Federal reserve act, which is more strict than this statute, and forbids the ownership of stock, as well as being an officer. All of that was done before he was sworn in, before the appointment came to the Senate.

Paragraph 13 raises a different question, stating that "the Government of the United States was defrauded out of $91,000 in the tax case of the Mellon National Bank while Andrew W. Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury."

In the first place, that is old, dried bones. That case was thoroughly considered by the select committee, of which the Senator from Michigan was the chairman. The facts were fully given by the representatives of the committee and the representatives of the bureau. The letter of explanation from the bureau, which shows that this merely followed the established course of construction of the act which had been applied to dozens of cases in the bureau before this case came up, appears in the appendix to the record of that subcommittee. When the subcommittee came to make its report to the Senate they did not condemn that finding, they did not find that it was wrongfully done, or make any reflection upon either Secretary Mellon or the Bureau of Internal Revenue for having made it. I can not understand, when that was the case years ago, why it should be raked up now with the statement that the Government of the United States was defrauded. The general remarks that I have to call attention to here in a minute apply to that as well as the next case.

The next one, in paragraph 14, is adroitly drawn. It reads:

> Whereas Andrew W. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, benefited through indefensible decisions in the tax case of the Gulf Oil Co., as disclosed by the select committee.

That would lead any Senator who read it to think that Mellon had benefited by a decision made in the case of his company while he sat there as Secretary of the Treasury, and I dare say that every Senator who read that recital drew that inference from it. The plain truth is that that decision was made under Commissioner Williams, when Secretary Houston was Secretary of the Treasury. It was decided February 28, 1921, before Mr. Mellon was either appointed or sworn in. And now, if you please, by inference here it is charged that Mellon defrauded the Government to his own benefit.

It is said that that is disclosed by the select committee of the Senate. The truth is that it was only in the minority report of that select committee that the time when that decision was made was brought out.

After that select committee had finished its most comprehensive examination of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, after it had made its report to the Senate, the chief counsel of that select committee came before the Finance Committee in the consideration of one of the tax bills. It was after the conclusion of the work of the Couzens committee. His name was Manson, and he was general counsel of the Couzens committee. In the hearing before the Finance Committee I asked Mr. Manson:

> May I ask one question more? In these cases, speaking generally, is the excessive allowance, in your judgment, due to mistakes of the bureau or is it due to corruption?
> Mr. MANSON. Oh, I do not maintain it is due to corruption. I do not maintain that. Get that straight.
> Senator REED of Pennsylvania. I am asking in all sincerity, because I am not familiar with the facts.
> Mr. MANSON. Oh, no.
> Senator REED of Pennsylvania. Have you found any evidence of corruption?
> Mr. MANSON. Oh, no; I have not any evidence of corruption.

At that same hearing Senator COUZENS himself, in discussing the question of fraud in the Internal Revenue Bureau, made the statement:

> I do not charge that anybody intentionally did anything wrong.

Yet the Senator is willing to introduce this resolution, which states baldly that the Government of the United States was defrauded by Mellon's bank, and that Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, benefited through indefensible decisions of the tax case of the Gulf Oil Co., and follows that with the statement that "there was much evidence of corruption, favoritism, violation of the law, and illegal settlements with certain large taxpayers reported by the select committee of the Senate appointed to investigate the Internal Revenue Bureau."

Mr. President, I am through. I can not understand how the Senator from Michigan, having made the statement before the Finance Committee at the conclusion of his investigation that he did not charge that anybody intentionally did anything wrong, and having his counsel there at the same session say that there was no evidence of corruption, can, in this resolution, recite as if it were a matter of course that corruption existed there in that bureau under Secretary Mellon.

Mr. President, I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance, and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I was about to suggest the absence of a quorum, but I will not do so if the Senator from Montana wishes to make some remarks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to talk briefly upon the pending resolution. I observe the hour of 2 o'clock is about at hand, and I do not want to begin talking unless we are going on with the consideration of this subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Michigan has gone to lunch, but I was wondering if we could not enter into some arrangement by which we could continue the consideration of this resolution and perhaps dispose of it.

Mr. WATSON. It can not be done except by unanimous consent, and I shall interpose an objection, because I want to take up for consideration the conference report on the radio bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, unless there is some arrangement for the disposition of this resolution after a fair and not unreasonably long discussion of it I would like to say to the Senators that they will not be able, in my judgment, to avoid its consideration by an objection or by taking up something else.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the consideration of the resolution. I would be glad to have a vote now. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the resolution under the precedents will go to the calendar, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 1271.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, in connection with Senate Resolution 173, which the Senate has just been considering, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a similar resolution introduced by me in March, 1924.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MCKELLAR March 28, 1924, and March 31, 1924, considered, modified, and placed on the calendar, is as follows:

> Whereas section 243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides as follows: "No person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, or first comptroller, or first auditor, or treasurer, or register shall, directly or indirectly, be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel, or purchase by himself, or another in trust for him, any public lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State or of the United States, or take or apply to his own use any emolument or gain for negotiating or transacting any business in the Treasury Department other than what shall be allowed by law, and every person who offends against any of the prohibitions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor and forfeit to the United States the penalty of $3,000, and shall upon conviction be removed from office and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States; and if any other person than the public prosecutor shall give information of any such offense upon which a prosecution and conviction shall be had, one-half the aforesaid penalty of $3,000, when recovered, shall be for the use of the person giving such information"; and
> Whereas section 3168 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides as follows: "Any internal-revenue officer who is or shall become interested, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or in the production, rectification, or redistillation of distilled spirits, shall be dismissed from office; and every officer who becomes so interested in any such manufacture, or production, rectification, or redistillation, or in the production of fermented liquors, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000"; and

Whereas it appears from a letter from A. W. Mellon addressed to KENNETH MCKELLAR, dated March 5, 1924: "The refunds to the Gulf Co. and its subsidiaries were charged against three appropriations, depending upon the year in which the taxes refunded were originally collected. The payments were $766,112.29 out of the appropriation for 'Refund of taxes illegally collected, 1918, and prior years'; $1,350,884.63 from a similar appropriation for 1919; and $1,211,143.07 for 1921"; and

Whereas it appears that in April, 1921, after A. W. Mellon had become Secretary of the Treasury in March, 1921, the Treasury refunded to the Gulf Refining Co. sums in amounts shown by excerpts from said letter; and

Whereas other settlements made with other companies in which the said A. W. Mellon is stockholder or otherwise interested; and

Whereas it appears that the said A. W. Mellon is interested in the Overholt Distilling Co.: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the Senate be, and is hereby, directed to hold hearings by itself or by a subcommittee and report with the least delay practicable:

First. Whether the said A. W. Mellon is directly or indirectly concerned in carrying on the business of trade or commerce.

Second. Whether he is the owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel.

Third. Whether he is holding the office of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in violation of section 243 of the Revised Statutes of the United States or any of the laws of the United States.

Fourth. Whether he is holding the office of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in violation of section 3168 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] is entitled to the floor upon the unfinished business under the agreement made last night previous to adjournment.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will yield for the purpose of permitting me to ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business in order that we may take up the conference report on the radio bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request in the absence of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield for that purpose?

Mr. BLAINE. I have just yielded to the Senator from South Dakota to enable him to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. NORBECK. In order to accommodate the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] and Senators having the radio legislation in charge, I have agreed that the migratory bird bill may be laid aside temporarily at this hour, and I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORBECK. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the conference report on the radio bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me submit a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], instead of going to the calendar as it would under the rule, may go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would like to think that over.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if it is not done now, it will be too late hereafter.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. For the present I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Nebraska, and unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the conference report.

CONFERENCE REPORT—RADIO REGULATION

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I submit the conference report and ask that it may be read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is such an important matter that I think we ought to have a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Blease	Bruce	Curtis
Bayard	Borah	Capper	Cutting
Bingham	Bratton	Caraway	Dale

Heflin	Nye	Steck
Johnson	Oddie	Steiwer

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The clerk will read the conference report on the radio bill.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 2317) entitled "An act continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by the House, and in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House insert the following:

"SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 9 of the radio act of 1927 is amended to read as follows:

"It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor; and shall make a fair and equitable allocation of licenses, wave lengths, time for operation, and station power to each of the States, the District of Columbia, the Territories and possessions of the United States within each zone, according to population. The licensing authority shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, whenever necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, when applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses: Provided, That if and when there is a lack of applications from any zone for the proportionate share of licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, or station power to which such zone is entitled, the licensing authority may issue licenses for the balance of the proportion not applied for from any zone, to applicants from other zones for a temporary period of 90 days each, and shall specifically designate that said apportionment is only for said temporary period. Allocations shall be charged to the State, District, Territory, or possession wherein the studio of the station is located and not where the transmitter is located."

And the House agree to the same.

JAMES E. WATSON,
JAMES COUZENS,
SIMEON D. FESS,
KEY PITTMAN,
C. C. DILL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.,
FREDERICK R. LEHLBACH,
A. M. FREE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think that a short statement regarding the conference report may be desired by some Senators. In the first place, the House amendments to the Senate provision regarding limitation of licenses was partly agreed to; that is, part of the House provision was taken and part of the Senate provision was taken. In other words, the House provision for granting broadcasting licenses for three months instead of six months, as was provided by the Senate bill, was agreed to, but the Senate provision for granting licenses for a year instead of six months as provided by the House was agreed to.

The principal reason why the Senate provision was agreed to is that there are some 16,000 ships and amateur licenses which would necessarily have to be renewed every six months, and the House conferees agreed that that was unnecessary. So that the House provision as to broadcasting licenses was agreed to, and the Senate provision as to other licenses was agreed to.

The next amendment concerned the Senate provision in the bill that the terms of all the commissioners should expire on February 23, 1929, and that then they would be reappointed for their regular terms as provided in the law for two, three, four, five, and six years. The House struck out that provision, but receded and allowed the Senate provision to stand.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Is it contemplated now to continue the Radio Commission in office indefinitely?

Mr. DILL. No; the bill as framed in both the House and the Senate provided that the commission's original jurisdiction should continue for one year from March 15, 1928; that would be until March 15, 1929; and then the commission would be an appellate body to which any radio matters might be referred.

Mr. BRATTON. But now, under the proposed law with reference to the expiration of the terms of the commissioners, that applies only to the commission acting as a reviewing body?

Mr. DILL. The provision which the Senate inserted, and to which the House finally agreed, provides that the terms instead of being for two, three, four, five, and six years, shall all end on February 23, 1929, and that then the President shall appoint, according to the terms provided by the original law, for two, three, four, five, and six years.

Mr. BRATTON. But after 1929, and while the commissioners are serving under appointments made in that way, they will exercise only reviewing or appellate jurisdiction?

Mr. DILL. From February 23 until March 15 they would be exercising full powers, and then they would become an appellate body.

Mr. BRATTON. The particular matter that I had in mind was whether, under the proposed law, the Radio Commission will be extended indefinitely as an original tribunal, rather than as an appellate tribunal. I understand that is not the case.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I understand, after a year the original jurisdiction will be exercised by the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And appellate jurisdiction will vest in the Radio Commission. What are the powers of the Radio Commission under this arrangement in connection with its appellate jurisdiction?

Mr. DILL. Under the appellate jurisdiction the Radio Commission has final authority as to everything. The Secretary of Commerce may exercise certain powers set out in the bill, such as granting new licenses and performing the administrative work that is now being done by the commission, but any person with an interest—and I call the Senator's attention to that it is very broad—any person with an interest may appeal any act or ruling of the secretary to the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What are claimed to be the advantages of continuing for one year the original jurisdiction of the Radio Commission?

Mr. DILL. In the first place, the commission has had a rather hectic career, if I may use that term. Congress failed to make an appropriation for it in the second deficiency appropriation bill last year, as it did for many other activities, and the commission had no money until December, when the deficiency bill was passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But, as I understand, the commission functioned until the appropriation became available, and then practically ceased to function.

Mr. DILL. I think that is true with the exception of one member. I think one member of the commission has functioned very well, even though the other members have not. Then, too, two of the commissioners died, and one of them resigned. The commission has been rather uncertain in its tenure, and, not knowing whether it was going to be continued after March 15, the members did not feel they should ask Congress to appropriate money that would build up a large personnel which would have to be dropped on the 15th of March. The members of the commission in the hearings have stated that if they were continued another year they would come to Congress and ask for a substantial appropriation in order that they might enlarge their activities and provide a personnel that would make their work more intelligent and more effective.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My understanding has been that another consideration has entered into the action of the nonaction of the Radio Commission, and that is the fact that the nominations of members of the commission have not been confirmed.

Mr. DILL. I think that is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And they have taken the position that they either can not or will not do anything substantial until the Senate shall have disposed of their nominations. I have felt that the best way to entitle a commissioner to confirmation was for him to demonstrate his value or usefulness. As I understand, there is no limitation on the power of a member of the commission by reason of the fact that his nomination has not been confirmed. I myself received a letter from a member or members of the commission stating that to be the case; that they felt embarrassed by the fact that their nominations had not been confirmed, and that the indication was nothing would be done until the Senate acted.

Mr. DILL. I wish to say in that connection that I have been a very severe critic of their failure to act. I think they have pursued an entirely mistaken course, and their very failure to act, I think, has delayed their confirmation, because some of us have been fearful that they were planning to do something that they were afraid to do before the question of their confirmation came before the Senate. I wish to say that one of the commissioners, Mr. Lafount, from the fifth zone, has gone ahead, has made some 70 changes in wave lengths in his own zone, and has been doing the work there just the same as though his nomination had been confirmed. He is making a record of which I think he can be proud.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it seems to me a very remarkable situation that the Radio Commission, having been appointed by the President and having been duly acting as a commission, declines to do any work of a material nature because it has not been confirmed. It looks as if it is undertaking to hold a threat over the Senate, and, so far as I am concerned, I desire to say that I am wholly opposed to being threatened.

Mr. DILL. I wish to say to the Senator that it is the understanding of the committee that as soon as this legislation shall be disposed of the question of confirmation will be brought before the Senate for action.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope for rejection, not for other action.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. While it is claimed that the commissioners have been afraid to act in the absence of confirmation, is it not true that they have acted in very many cases without confirmation, while in other cases, where they did not want to act, they have used their failure of confirmation as an excuse for refusing to act?

Mr. DILL. I think the Senator's statement is correct. I know of no defense for the refusal of the commission to act in many of these cases.

Mr. BARKLEY. They had sufficient power to authorize the construction of a 50,000-watt broadcasting station in Chicago by Mr. Insull recently, did they not?

Mr. DILL. They did. They have all the power that they would have whether confirmed or not; there is no question about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask the Senator another question. We have all received many protests from people in our States and all over the country with reference to the activities or lack of activities of the Radio Commission with respect to chain broadcasting stations, and monopolies, and all that. To what extent does this proposed legislation cure that situation?

Mr. DILL. This proposed legislation does not attempt to control chain broadcasting. The commission already has power to control chain broadcasting. Nor does it attempt to meet the so-called monopoly complaints as such. If the Senator will bring that up a little later when I discuss the chain system, I will be glad to answer him further.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand the Senator to have stated that Mr. Lafount went along and granted some permits and that he has done his work: His nomination has not been confirmed, has it?

Mr. DILL. No.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand there is only one member of that commission whose nomination has been confirmed.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. He happens to live in my zone, and the complaint among my people is against the nonaction of the commission on the ground that it is awaiting the confirmation of the other members. The member from my zone is confirmed; he is the only member of the commission whose nomination has been confirmed. I know the Senator has given much time and thought to the subject. Why is it that Mr. Lafount has been able to do all these things when his nomination has not been confirmed and a member who is confirmed is holding up everything down in my zone?

Mr. DILL. I can not answer that question fully other than to say that Mr. Lafount has been able to do these things he has done because he has shown initiative and ability to go ahead and to make these changes, and the other members of the commission have approved his action. Whether the commissioner representing the zone of the Senator has tried to remedy the conditions of which he complains, and the commission has refused to permit the changes, I do not know.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. SMITH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DILL. I think the Senator from Tennessee was first on his feet.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was very much interested in the statement just made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], in which the Senator from Washington concurred, in reference to the Radio Commission awarding to Samuel Insull, of Chicago, a 50,000-watt power station. That is more than has been awarded to all the broadcasters in the whole southern division. Has any reason been given by the commission to indicate why they are powerless to act on other applications and yet are able to give to Samuel Insull, of Chicago, of fame or of lack of fame or of notoriety, such a large amount of power?

Mr. DILL. So far as I know, the only reason given was that the application was made and that he had the facilities to present excellent programs, and the commission were willing that a high-power station should be located in Chicago.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, they give the power to whom they want to give it and use the excuse of their failure of confirmation for not giving the smaller users of power what they should have.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, to them that have is given and to them that have not is taken even that which they have. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question in connection with the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] concerning the commissioner in his zone. I presume that the map which is hanging on the wall is an accurate picture of the zones.

Mr. DILL. Yes; it is drawn for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH. Have the commissioners been selected with reference to their citizenship within the respective zones?

Mr. DILL. Yes; they have been; each commissioner must be a resident citizen of the zone which he represents.

Mr. SMITH. I know that consideration is a matter of very great importance in legislation along this line as well as along some other lines.

Mr. DILL. I should like to discuss the amendments, and then I may answer a number of questions as I go along.

The House amendment which has caused so much discussion was the amendment which it added to the Senate bill and which reads as follows:

> The licensing authority shall make an equal allocation to each of the five zones established in section 2 of this act broadcasting licenses, wave lengths, and station power, and within each zone shall make a fair and equitable allocation among the different States thereof in proportion to population and area.

I think the word "area" has been stricken out.

Mr. WATSON. That word has been stricken out.

Mr. DILL. That provision, as I have read it, imposed a rigid, hard and fast rule. It attempted to bring equality of radio service by a mathematical formula. It entirely disregarded nature and scientific facts regarding radio.

Mr. SMITH. Based on population?

Mr. DILL. The distribution in States within a zone is to be based on population. The equal division was based upon the zones as they were established by the law when the commission was created. When the measure went to conference the Senate conferees believed that the situation was such that some legislation to compel equality of service was necessary.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the map which I have had hung on the wall at the back of the Chamber to show what the condition is in so far as the commission has already allocated wave lengths and power. This zone [indicating] in the New England section, including New England and the States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, the District of Columbia, and Maryland, containing less than 4 per cent of the area and about 24,000,000 people, has been granted 223,000 watts of station power. What we mean by "station power" is the number of electric watts the stations use to force their signals out from the transmitter. This little area, embracing less than 4 per cent of the area of the country, has been given 37 per cent of all of the power used by all the radio stations in the United States.

The second zone, containing Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, and Michigan, had 106,000 watts, only half of the little zone above it.

This great area of 11 Southern States, known as the third zone, had 47,000 watts, as compared with this little area with 223,000 watts.

The fourth zone, the great Central West, running to the Canadian line, had 165,000 watts of power.

The fifth zone, containing the western part of the United States and Alaska, but with nearly all of its important stations in the States, had 62,000 watts of power.

Thus you will see that the greatest power has been given to the smallest area.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. Just a moment.

These high-powered stations, these stations permitted to use a large amount of power, use that power with but two results, namely, to drown out all other electrical signals within the radius which they serve continuously and to send signals out across the country long distances.

I have another map over here, which explains this situation even more fully.

There are three 50,000-watt stations in the northeastern section of the United States. Those are the highest-powered broadcasting stations we have. They are as follows:

WEAF, in New York, with 50,000.

WGY, at Schenectady, with 50,000.

KDKA, at Pittsburgh, with 50,000.

There is also WJZ, at Boundbrook, N. J., with 30,000.

There are four stations with a total of 180,000 watts of power in this little corner of the country, and the whole remaining part of the United States has no station to exceed 10,000 watts in power.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Were those stations opened after the commission was appointed?

Mr. DILL. Oh, KDKA was the original licensed station, I think, in the United States, but it did not have this high power.

Mr. COPELAND. And it was in existence before the commission was appointed?

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes. All of them were in existence before the commission was appointed. There is no question about that. But WEAF had only 5,000 watts. They are the great corporation stations of the Radio Corporation, the General Electric, and the Westinghouse Co.

Nobody, so far as I know, is complaining of giving these stations the right to broadcast with such power as will send their programs out clearly. The complaint comes because of the fact that these immensely high-powered stations send out their signals in such a way that they interfere with and heterodyne other stations in other sections of the country, and in that way blanket the radio field.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. The fact which the Senator has pointed out, that particularly in zone No. 1, in the New Jersey and New York section, they have these large stations, is not a matter of any satisfaction to the local people—quite the contrary.

Mr. DILL. The fact of the matter is it is the worst possible thing for them.

Mr. EDGE. Exactly. All or a large proportion of my protests from New Jersey come because of the fact that the large station of the Radio Corporation of America, I believe, at Boundbrook drowns out all the local radio so that they get a hum and do not get even the big radio stations.

Mr. DILL. And if they try to get any other station anywhere on the dial, these high-powered stations force them off.

Mr. EDGE. Exactly so.

Mr. DILL. And that makes the advertising value of the high-powered station greater, because everybody in that area must listen to it. That is why they wanted this high power, and the commission has given them what they want.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, I wanted to make it clear that this large number of watts—and I am not enough of a radio engineer to discuss it from the practical standpoint—is not sought by the local residents of those districts.

Mr. DILL. Not at all.

Mr. EDGE. We would be very glad indeed if they were not there.

Mr. DILL. I am sure the radio listeners of that section do not desire such high power for those stations.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, does the Senator understand that the amendment that it is proposed to agree upon corrects the situation that he is describing at the present time?

Mr. DILL. Before I leave this subject I want to say that the amendment attempts to equalize in part the distribution of power and, as I believe, will remedy the indefensible injustice of the present division.

Mr. McMASTER. Is the Senator aware of the fact that one of the commissioners has been spreading propaganda up in the New England States and in that particular part of the country against any change in the law that would permit the diminishing of the power?

Mr. DILL. Yes, Mr. President; and at the proper time, when the confirmation question is up, I shall discuss the fitness of an unconfirmed administrative official of this Government doing that.

Mr. McMASTER. Will the Senator, at some time during his talk, explain in a concrete way just how the amendment will change that situation?

Mr. DILL. Yes. I want to get this situation clear, and then I thought I would try to do that.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Will placing these chain stations on one wave length obviate the trouble that we have in the South?

Mr. DILL. That brings up another question. The engineers who have been before the committee have stated that it has not yet proved to be practicable and feasible to broadcast chain programs on one wave length. In other words, these station oscillators, these transmitters, send out their vibrations at a terrific speed, so fast that the human mind can not conceive of it. It runs up into the hundreds of thousands per second; and they have not yet reached the point of accuracy in keeping a transmitter at its speed or on its wave length, on its frequency, exactly enough to prevent variations in the different wave lengths and, therefore, this variation by different broadcasting instruments causes a squeal and makes it impossible to hear the program. So the best information that the engineers have given us is to the effect that chain broadcasting on one wave length is not practicable.

It is true that in Massachusetts two stations are broadcasting on one wave length; but we find that those stations are connected by wires that keep them on the same frequency, and it would cost literally millions and millions of dollars to connect all of the chain stations of the country in such a way as to be able to do that. It may be that the time will come when that can be done, but it does not seem to be practicable up to this time.

Mr. MAYFIELD. The great complaint that I receive from my people is that when they are listening to a musical program or to a sermon they are interrupted by the broadcasting of a bridge game. Bridge, bridge, bridge, comes in all the time; and they want to get away from that.

Mr. DILL. I have this map to show what the chain system to-day is.

A program originates, we will say, at WEAF. The National Broadcasting System has its main headquarters, its chain station, there. These dark lines that run to all these various cities represent the chain stations that broadcast the same program on different wave lengths in all sections of this country; so that you see how the New York program is sent out to all the sections as far west as Denver.

Mr. BARKLEY. At the same time?

Mr. DILL. At the same time, but on their own individual wave lengths. Then out at Los Angeles there is another chain of the broadcasting stations running up the Pacific coast and into Spokane, my own town. They have not yet made a regular connection between Denver and the coast, although they sometimes do, for special occasions make that hook up and connect even a larger number of stations.

Each of these stations broadcasts on its own wave length with its own power; and the commission has cleared 25 channels. There are 89 channels available for broadcasting. They have cleared, as they call it, 25 channels. They have taken off all of the important stations, but two or three—sometimes only two, sometimes three, sometimes four stations off these wave lengths. They put a station like WEAF, of New York, on a wave length, and then they have placed another station—I think KGW, in Portland, Oreg.—on the same wave length, as I remember. WRC, here in Washington, is on the same wave length as KFI, in Los Angeles. In other words, they have cleared the channels so that there will not be much interference between these stations.

Then on 23 of these 25 channels that have been cleared for the purpose of giving the distant listener a chance to hear various programs, they have these chain programs. The result is that when a listener is hearing the chain program at Cincinnati, the bridge game the Senator talks about, and it is on a certain wave length, and he does not want to hear it, he tunes over to the wave length of Cleveland, and he gets the same program; and then he tunes to Chicago and gets the same program; he tunes to Des Moines and gets the same program. Thus, all of these big stations on these cleared channels run the same programs; and that is the cause of this complaint of the people who can not get away from the bridge game. The other channels have so many stations on them that they interfere seriously if a listener attempts to tune in on any of them from a distance.

We had the commissioners before us about two months ago——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DILL. In just a moment. We discussed this matter with them, and they said that they thought changes ought to be made and that these chain stations should be put on the wave lengths that were more crowded, because they were only supposed to serve local purposes, and leave these cleared channels for the independent programs. But all this time has gone by and nothing has been done, and nothing will be done, I suppose, until the commission has been passed upon; and that is one of my causes of complaint against the commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. It could be done?

Mr. DILL. It could be done; yes; and they said they would do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator this question:

As I read the figures, and according to the Senator's statement, three of these broadcasting stations have about one-fourth of all the power of the air?

Mr. DILL. The Senator can add it up.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have done so, and that is correct.

Mr. DILL. There are 625,000 watts, approximately, and here are three stations that have 150,000 watts.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is substantially one-fourth. Now, under the provisions of this amendment, are the commissioners directed to equalize that situation; or have they the power, under this, to proceed to permit these three great advertising concerns that the Senator speaks of to monopolize one-fourth of all the power of the air?

Mr. DILL. This bill provides that they shall divide the wave lengths, the power, and the time of operation as nearly equally between those zones as possible. When you cut the first zone from 223,000 down to 125,000, if you do not use any more power in the whole country than you do, you can not leave two or three stations of 50,000 watts apiece without shutting off all the rest; and you have to assume that this commission will use some judgment and some sense, and that they will not do a thing like that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it is perfectly apparent that if the commission does the fair thing it will not allow three broadcasting concerns to own and operate and control one-fourth of all the air power of the country; but what I want to know is, under the amendment as reported by the conference committee, will this be done?

Mr. DILL. I do not think so. I may say this——

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I think we ought to amend it.

Mr. DILL. The conferees discussed the question of attempting to limit the commission in granting more than a certain amount of power to a radio station; but the changes in radio are so rapid, and conditions vary so often, that it seemed unwise legislation to attempt, by legislative fiat, to fix a scientific proposition such as that would be.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would not be a scientific proposition. That would be just a fair proposition. It is an equitable proposition. It is inconceivable to me that any commission having to do with this, appointed under the law, would so far forget themselves as to permit three concerns of the country to own one-fourth of all the air power of the country. It seems to me to be such a shame that the Congress ought to correct it at earliest possible moment; and I am astonished to think that we have any such condition here.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator in his main contention; but I do not think the Senator thinks that Congress should undertake to parcel out these wave lengths any more than we should make railroad rates.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me to answer, the radio commission is but the servant of the Congress, and the Congress has the right to direct it what to do, and we ought to direct it to do the fair and straight thing. We ought not to recognize any commission that would permit such a state of affairs in regard to this great new discovery or invention such as the Senator has portrayed here this afternoon.

Mr. WATSON. That is precisely what we do in the last amendment adopted.

Mr. DILL. Let me say that that is, after all, an engineering question, to be decided by experts.

Mr. WATSON. That is all there is to it.

Mr. DILL. And it did not seem wise to the conferees to attempt to legislate on an engineering question.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. Is it not true that under the amendments proposed here after all the commission can do exactly as it pleases?

Mr. DILL. No; I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. McMASTER. Where is there any restricting language?

Mr. DILL. There is no restricting language as to the amount of watts they can give any one station. Let me say this to the Senator, they could put a 50,000-watt station down in Florida, another in New Orleans, and another in Los Angeles. I hope they do not, but they could.

Mr. McMASTER. Yes; but they are not obliged to do it. They can leave that radio station in exactly the present condition if they choose.

Mr. DILL. No.

Mr. McMASTER. Where is the commanding language?

Mr. DILL. Let me read to the Senator:

> It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radiobroadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave-lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones.

So that they are directed by law to give equality of service, both in transmission and in reception, and then, to explain what we mean by transmission and reception, we say by dividing as nearly equally as possible the station power, the wave lengths, the time of operation, and the licenses.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I think this situation to-day is intolerable and inexcusable. I do not care whether it is brought about by acts of omission or acts of commission, it is indefensible. I think the independent broadcaster and the masses of the people throughout the country are not accorded equitable use of the air nor the benefits of this new discovery.

Under the terms of the bill, suppose the present commission or some other commission were to determine that the present situation is fair and is equitable under existing conditions. What remedy would the people have?

Mr. DILL. Any station, under this law, can go into court and overturn any such allocations as to-day exist that do not make equality possible. The present allocations can not be defended on any theory of equality of service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. How could any broadcaster do that when the Senator has just stated that under his own interpretation of this proposed law the commission will not change the situation as it exists to-day, but that the three great broadcasting stations that now control one-fourth of all the power can continue under the proposed law? If those three can continue under the proposed law, no broadcaster could go into court and get relief.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator understood me to say that, he misunderstood me.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. DILL. I did not make that statement, or at least did not intend to, because I am certain the courts can and will protect both broadcasters and listeners under this law against the inequality now being practiced.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I want to direct the attention of Senators to this map. Here are five zones. The southern zone, which is the third zone, is larger in area than any other zone in the country. It has more people living in it than any other zone in the United States. Yet it has only 47,000 watts. Two stations in the State of New York have 50,000 watts each. Pittsburgh has a station with 50,000 watts. I want to know if there is anything in this conference report that will give the Southern States a more equitable division?

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator know whether or not anybody ever applied for more power down there?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes; I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do. I know a man who has been here for weeks demanding of the commission that additional amounts of power be given to certain stations in my State, and the reply has been that they are not going to do anything until these men are confirmed. In other words, they imply a threat.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, there are applications pending at this moment before the commission for 70,000 additional watts from people in my State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, is it or not true that by reason of the unfair allocation of power to some stations in certain sections of the country other stations already in existence have been compelled to go out of business, in addition to the denial of the right to establish new ones?

Mr. DILL. That is one of the excuses the commission has given for not licensing stations, that there were so many stations on the air and too much power was already being used. There have been plenty of applications. The trouble seems to have been that applications of certain stations were granted readily and others were refused or delayed.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I can see very plainly that in any attempt to make any hard and fast rule of division—in other words, to take the country and divide it into five equal parts, either on the basis of population or of area—there might be perfectly justifiable ground for criticism, as, for instance, in the evidence of the allotment of watts; but I think some of the Senators representing sections having a lesser number of watts fail to understand some phases of the engineering problem, which I will freely admit I understand only in the most general way.

New Jersey is in this first zone, which has been discussed so frequently as having 106,000 watts. As a matter of interest and desire the people of New Jersey are willing to give to Texas or to any other State of the Union three-fourths of that power, because, as a matter of fact, it interferes with their service. We do not want it; we have no desire for it. The smaller stations in New Jersey, providing more or less local programs, are very much more popular to the average citizen with a small radio than the great big station at Bound Brook, which has been referred to by the Senator from Washington.

The latter station simply drowns out all the small programs, and I have hundreds, almost thousands, of protests about it. I think all will admit there must be large stations in order to have a cross-country service, and even an over-seas service, which they are giving these days. So far as the actual distribution is concerned, if there is any mechanical way whereby the large stations can be relocated, they should be divided in some way between the Atlantic and the Pacific, the North and the South, so that every citizen could get the service. As far as zone No. 1 is concerned, from my knowledge, we would be delighted to have two or three of these stations taken and put in some other section of the country.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey says that the people of New Jersey would be glad to surrender a part of the power allocated——

Mr. EDGE. To the large stations.

Mr. BRATTON. Would those concerns themselves be ready to surrender any part of it?

Mr. EDGE. I can not speak for those concerns.

Mr. BRATTON. That is the thing about which we complain, that the commission does not take steps to deprive them of it, and allocate it fairly and equitably throughout the country.

Mr. EDGE. Then the engineering problem, I think, enters into it, a matter which I can not discuss. Somebody else will have to discuss that.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to say, in response to the question of the Senator from Indiana, which I understood was a query as to whether the southern stations were demanding more power——

Mr. WATSON. Not right now, not "are demanding," but at the inception did demand, in the beginning.

Mr. RANSDELL. I can speak for only one station in my State, which I know has been making the most persistent efforts for the past seven or eight months to get more power. It is station KWKH, at Shreveport. They have a very splendid station there. They have been working hard to get more power, and they have not got it. They are trying hard to get 3,500 watts.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, we can hear them very well on the radio. Every time I tune in my radio set all I hear is "This is Shreveport," and complaining about their lack of power.

Mr. RANSDELL. That may be, but they have only 1,000 watts and they have been asking for 3,500; but they have not got it.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington has the floor and Senators desiring to interrupt him must address the Chair and the Chair will endeavor to learn from the Senator having the floor whether he desires to yield.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to answer all the questions I can. I recognize that this subject is very involved, and I do not want to shut off any Senator who has any question to ask. I recognize how easy it is for the debate to be taken entirely away from me, however. But I want to be as liberal as possible.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. There seems to be what I regard as a mistaken impression, that is, that very high-powered stations are essential to chain broadcasting. I wish the Senator would explain that that is not true.

Mr. DILL. I may say that the high-powered station has nothing whatever to do with the broadcasting by the chain system, that the wires simply carry the program to the station, and one station may broadcast at 500 and one at 5,000 and one at 10,000. Each is individual in its own field. The power of the originating station has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Is there any provision in this bill under which the American public can get now and then a space during the evening performance to hear something sensible, rather than be drowned out with jazz?

Mr. DILL. I must say to the Senator that we have not written in the bill any direction to the commission as to allowing only jazz programs or only some other kind of programs. In other words, that would mean giving the commission the power of censorship, and that is not desirable.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Virginia said a moment ago that when he takes up his receiver about all he hears is the complaint of Shreveport that they have not power enough to get their program on the air. My experience has been that I can not get to hear anything but "Tin-pan alley." That is about all we get in the evening.

Mr. DILL. I want to say this, that I think that while the House amendment has been a good thing for the Congress, because it has enabled us to get our views before the country, it has been a better thing for the commission. I think the members of the commission have learned something of the country's sentiment through the discussion of this legislation. I believe the commission will try to carry out the new provisions of the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator this question: If these high-powered stations are not necessary to chain broadcasting, why is it that they have demanded and received such enormous amounts of power?

Mr. DILL. The commissioners have explained their action by saying that they wanted to give these fine programs put on in New York and Pittsburgh and Schenectady to the southern and western country, and they must have some high-powered stations to do it. At the same time, they defend the chain program on the theory that they must carry these fine programs by wire to the various communities.

Certainly there is no need of both. When the chain is in operation there can be no defense for the high power anywhere on the chain, except it be in a place like Denver, away out in the middle of the mountains, where there is no station within 500 miles that carries a chain program.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the Senator, he thinks that the chief fault lies in the action of the present commission.

Mr. DILL. I do. I want to say further that in my judgment if the commission had carried out the law as it is now written, this legislation would not have been necessary. The present law provides that the licensing authority shall distribute these wave lengths and power in such a way as to give all the people of the various States and communities fair, efficient, and equitable radio service. They have distorted the interpretation of that into meaning that they must give a New York program to somebody down in southern Texas, or out in Colorado, even though there is no chain, and therefore they defend these high-power stations. It never was intended by Congress. There is no good defense of it, in my judgment.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator has just declared himself on the very question I had in mind. I know he has given a great deal of thought to this subject and perhaps knows as much about the attitude of the commission as anybody. But what the Senator has said up to this time in justification of the commission's action or nonaction does not satisfy me at all. I am wondering if the commission has ever offered any additional reason for failure to act.

Mr. DILL. I have heard no additional reasons, and I shall express my opinion about the members of the commission when we take them up for confirmation. In fact, I have collected much other data for that purpose.

Mr. BRATTON. I shall do so too, but for the time being I want to put myself on record as saying that I think the record of the commission up to date is indefensible.

Mr. DILL. It is a very striking fact to me that the man who was put on the commission last and who would be supposed to know least about its work, or was supposed to know least about it, is doing the most to correct the situation.

Mr. BRATTON. I concur in that. I think the commissioner representing the fifth zone has done remarkable work, and it simply accentuates the fact that there is no justification for the failure of the other members of the commission to act.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. As I follow the Senator—and I am inclined to a great extent to accept his views—there is nothing materially wrong with the law.

Mr. DILL. I do not think so.

Mr. EDGE. It is a question of its administration.

Mr. DILL. But the commission has taken the position that there is an ambiguous wording in the equitable-service provision, and so we have tried to write this language so clearly that there could not be any doubt about what we mean. All of the qualifying phrases are for the purpose of making clear that Congress desires the commisison to divide licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, and power equally among the five zones.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, the Senator is now trying to direct them, as far as it is possible in a more or less involved mechanical responsibility, about making an equitable division.

Mr. DILL. Absolutely. This legislation should not be necessary at all, and if we had a commission which would carry out the purposes of Congress it would not be necessary. For instance, we have put in certain directions as to how the commission is to provide the equality of service which we have declared the people of each zone to be entitled to. When we said "equality of service," "both of transmission and reception," we have gone ahead and explained the meaning by directing that the commission shall allocate as nearly equal as possible the licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, and station power. We do not mean equality of transmission and reception in terms of high-power stations in the East for listeners in the South and West. We mean equality in terms of licenses, wave length, time of operation, and station power. Any other interpretation is false and in defiance of the purpose of this provision.

Mr. EDGE. I want to say that I have great confidence in the Senator from Washington and the Congressman from Maine and others on the conference committee in dealing with an involved question of this kind, if they can bring in a unanimous report, as they have, knowing their desire to serve all sections of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not a unanimous report.

Mr. EDGE. It is unanimous on the part of the Senate. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] submit a unanimous report so far as they are concerned, and I do hope the conference report will be adopted in order that we may at least give it a trial.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to say to the Senator that there have been many complaints from my State about the administration of the law and about the unfairness shown by the commission. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] just stated about what I had in mind; that is, whether it is the fault of the law or the fault of the administration of the law. I suppose the Senator is going to discuss in detail just what changes have been made in the law by this measure?

Mr. DILL. There is some ground for difference of opinion about the meaning of equitable service, but I take it there can be no difference of opinion as to what is meant by equality of service when we say "both of transmission and of reception," and then, in order to secure that equality, we command the commission to make an equal distribution of wave lengths, power, time of operation, and station power.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the present commissioners have distorted the meaning of the law now on the statute books, can we hope that the present commissioners will act with any greater intelligence or judgment in interpreting the new law?

Mr. DILL. We will have an opportunity to pass on those commissioners in a few days, and I shall discuss that question more at length then. I want to say, though, that I think even these commissioners have learned a lesson from the fight which has been carried on in the House. They have been led to see that Congress and the country want a change.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has been a pretty expensive lesson to the people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to the wording of this particular provision:

> Equality of radiobroadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor.

Are not those words "in so far as there are applications therefor" likely to give rise to the same misunderstanding and to the same confusion or the same difference of opinion under which the commission, when appointed or as acting, can continue the present deplorable situation in so far as radio is concerned?

Mr. DILL. Let me answer by first calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that if we struck out those words, we still have a provision at the end of the paragraph that says that if there is any unused power it may be distributed among the zones. So far as I am able to judge, the language complained of by the Senator is surplusage, and I am not concerned whether it is in or out. There was a difference of opinion among the House conferees, some wanting it in and others wanting it out, but the majority voted to leave it in.

I have placed on the wall a chart showing the amount of power requested by radio applicants in the different zones, the amount of power granted, and the amount denied. I call attention to the fact that 107,000 watts of power was requested in the first zone and 74,000 granted; 135,000 requested in the second zone and 11,000 granted; 84,000 requested in the third zone and 10,000 granted.

Mr. MAYFIELD. When was that?

Mr. DILL. Since the installation of the commission. There was 181,000 in the fourth zone and 140,000 granted; 65,000 in the fifth zone and 35,000 granted.

Those figures were given me by the secretary of the commission a few days ago, and he later found that there were some small differences, so they are not exactly accurate, but the proportions are approximately the same. They show that there were plenty of applications to have made up the proportionate share of power, had the commission granted them, but there was no law compelling them to grant those licenses in case there were applications. If there are no applications, certainly there is no reason why we should put in cold storage a certain amount of wave length and a certain amount of power.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. It appears that the third zone, which embraces the entire South, made application for 84,000 watts and got 10,000?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That zone was discriminated against in a way that no other zone was.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that I have had from my State various complaints from parties who are trying to get some of this power. One of those concerns was trying to get 10,000 watts, the total amount that was granted to the whole zone.

I agree with the Senator that very likely the trouble we are in now is of a dual nature. One of the causes is the inactivity or the malactivity of the commissioners appointed. The other is the inadequacy of the law. The law as it is written is too broad. It allows probably any sort of interpretation that the commission may see fit to place upon it. I think the change which the conference report proposes will in part remedy the trouble so far as the law is concerned, provided and only provided that it carries out the will of Congress. I believe that the debates which have taken place here this afternoon will indicate to any commission that may be appointed what construction the Congress places upon the language. If the commission is one which desires to carry out the law, then I do not believe it will have any difficulty in ascertaining what was the purpose of Congress in enacting the law.

Now, I want to ask the Senator a question. Under the reported bill how long would it be, if we should confirm these men, before we could get rid of them if they do not comply with our wishes?

Mr. DILL. That is the reason for the Senate amendment which the House accepted—namely, that they would hold office until the 23d of February, 1929, and then they must come up for confirmation again. The Senate committee were so fearful of intrusting the present commissioners, if they should be confirmed for any great length of time, that we put in that amendment so that if they do not carry out the new law we can refuse to confirm them if they are reappointed and can have new commissioners appointed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then does not the Senator think the best thing we can do in the circumstances is not to confirm these men, because they have heretofore willfully, it would seem, refused to act or at least to act in the interest of the public? Some of them being refused their confirmation, will other commissioners be appointed who will have full knowledge of the purpose of the new law, and then, if they do not carry it out, as I understand the Senator, we can remove them at the end of one year?

Mr. DILL. The question of confirmation is not up and I do not want to go into it at this time. I will say that I agree that some of these commissioners should not be confirmed and I hope a majority of the Senate will agree with me; I shall discuss that when the question comes before the Senate for action.

Mr. SIMMONS. The only reason why I suggest that now is because I do not feel that with the record of the present commissioners before us we should have any doubt about what ought to be our action in the premises. I wanted to know if we put in some other men, as I think we will do, whether we will be able to get rid of them in a year unless they carry out the spirit and purpose of the law.

Mr. DILL. That is the provision of the new statute.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has exhibited to us a chart showing for each zone the requests made for power, the quantity of power granted, and the amount denied. May I ask the Senator if it costs a lot of money to install a radio station?

Mr. DILL. Yes; and I want to discuss that for a moment, if I can get the opportunity to do so.

Mr. COPELAND. Is it not probable, may I ask the Senator, that many times where power was requested, on investigation the commission found that the people requesting it did not have the means to establish the station?

Mr. DILL. That may be true, and it may be that the commission found that they did not have the financial backing which would enable them to present programs that would justify the allowance of the request. I am not saying that that power should be granted, but I do say there were sufficient applications that no such inequality is necessary as is shown in the present condition.

Mr. COPELAND. But the Senator will point out that it costs a lot of money to install a plant and a lot of money to operate it?

Mr. DILL. Yes. My own opinion is that these 50,000-watt stations should not be permitted in the radio field. In the first place, they take an enormous expenditure of money and in the second place they are a radio nuisance both where they exist and throughout the country as a whole. If the power was kept down to a reasonable basis I think we would be a lot better off; at least I would like to see it tried.

The Senator is correct in this. It costs a tremendous amount of money to provide a 50,000-watt station, and there are not many sections of the country where there are organizations of capital that are willing to invest the necessary amount of money. In fairness it may be said that there have not been applications for these high-powered stations in some sections of the country, but that does not justify the allocation of so much power to a few big stations in one corner of the country and then the refusal of power to stations in other sections of the country because it is said so much has already been granted.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is entirely correct in his explanation.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DILL. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I have been advised of one application made by a group of men who did not realize the tremendous cost involved. It developed that they did not have money enough even to buy the microphones. Of course, it is very proper in such a case that there should be a denial of the application.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say that in the case of the two applications of which I spoke as coming from North Carolina the conditions which the Senator from New York has described did not exist. The applicants had the money; one of them had his plant, and was ready at once to utilize the power for which he asked. I know that of my own knowledge.

Mr. DILL. That has been true in most cases and the commission is to blame.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] a moment ago asked a question, and the Senator from Washington started to answer it, but was interrupted.

Mr. DILL. I have forgotten what the question was.

Mr. WATSON. The question was in regard to the use of the words "in so far as there are applications therefor," whether or not these applications are pending. That is the question which constituted the main point of disagreement between the Senate conferees and the House conferees, and I should like the Senator to go into that fully and explain it.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, my own thought is that whether that language shall be in the proposed law or not, the proposed law will cover those cases; in other words, if there are applications pending then, according to the provision in the latter part of the paragraph, a proportionate share may be divided up among other zones. I do not see any need of putting in the language twice, but there were certain of the House conferees who were extremely anxious to have it inserted, because they thought otherwise it would first have to be decreed, to go into cold storage, as it were, and the request of other stations denied, and then another application and another routine procedure would necessarily be gone through before the application could be granted. They claimed that meant delay and red tape and insisted the words mentioned be inserted. My own view is that the commission would do the practical thing in either case, so I refused to take sides between the House conferees who were in disagreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to suggest that the words "when and in so far as there are applications therefor" must have been put into the bill for some purpose. I can not conceive of how any member of the committee would have suggested those words or have added those words unless there were some purpose in so doing. When I look at a number of applications as given in the exhibit "radio-station power," it looks as if there are applications for 575,000 watts, which is nearly all of it. How could the words have any application in view of those figures?

Mr. DILL. Of course, conditions in the future might be different. There might not be so many applications in the future.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is possible; but what I fear is that the inclusion of this language to the minds of those who are behind it has some meaning, and that meaning is to confuse the issue and to prevent an equalization, in my judgment.

Mr. DILL. I think that was the fear that some of the House conferees had, but I have not shared that view.

Mr. COUZENS and Mr. HARRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DILL. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to say to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] that there was considerable discussion with respect to that particular feature, and one of the conferees was afraid that some of the zones which now have in excess of their quota might arbitrarily have it taken away, whether there was need for it elsewhere or not; and there seemed to be no justification for doing that. Is not that correct?

Mr. DILL. Yes. As I have stated, I do not think it makes any difference whether the words are retained or not. I think the effect will be just the same.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if I may ask a question of the Senator from Michigan, he is of the opinion that the words that I have quoted, "when and in so far as there are applications therefor," have only the meaning that he has suggested?

Mr. COUZENS. Absolutely. I think the conferees were unanimous in the belief that that was the exact meaning, and that no zone would be required to go without its quota for any reason whatsoever; but that in case such zone did not require or ask for or petition for or apply for the power, it would not be fair automatically to take it away from some other zone which might need it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I may ask the Senator one other question, does he believe that under the wording of this proposed statute there will be an equal distribution of power throughout the country according to zones?

Mr. COUZENS. That is certainly the intent of the proposed law, and I think it is very specific.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DILL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. From the information I receive I wish to say that the people in my State are getting less than one-third of the service they got a year ago. There will be no demand for power if they can not get the service, and at this time they can not get any service west of Pittsburgh; they can not get any from New Orleans. The distance is being limited more and more. I understood from the Senator that the nominations of the commissioners, or some of them, at any rate, would not come up for confirmation until some time next year.

Mr. DILL. No; the question of the confirmation of their nominations will come up within a few days.

Mr. HARRIS. When will their terms expire?

Mr. DILL. Their terms will expire on the 23d of February next, when all of them will be up for reappointment.

Mr. HARRIS. For the RECORD I offer a letter from Col. W. E. Simmons, of Lawrenceville, Ga., one of the leading men of my State, which I ask may be printed at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

LAWRENCEVILLE, GA., March 19, 1928.

Senator W. J. HARRIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see in the Constitution of this morning that the two Houses of Congress have disagreed on radiobroadcasting and that the two bills will be sent to conference.

Probably this letter will reach you too late to serve its purpose, but I take a long shot at it anyhow.

The people of this State are getting not exceeding one-third of the service that they were a few months ago, which is due to the formation of a National Radio Corporation, with headquarters in New York City, of which the Metropolitan Station of that city is exclusive manager.

It is called a "chain," and there are 28 broadcasting stations in it, each of which broadcasts the same thing at the same time, and two-thirds of the territory covered prior to the creation of this combination is absolutely cut off, and these are constantly on the air during broadcasting hours. Pittsburgh, Pa., is now as far west as can be heard in Georgia, and even New Orleans has been cut out, and I suppose all the other Southern States are in the same situation, nor farther north than New York City.

Before this corporation came into existence we could hear regularly from any section of the United States within the reach of our radio.

In my opinion, the only remedy to get rid of this abominable situation is to abolish this chain, or any other like one if there be such a one.

Yours truly,

W. E. SIMMONS.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to one other table on the wall which shows what has happened under the Radio Commission. When the law was passed on February 23, 1927, the first zone had 200,000 watts of power. The figures on this chart were issued on March 15. The map was made up a little earlier so there is a slight variation from the figures on the map. This chart gives 214,000 watts, an increase of 14,000 watts to a zone that already had 200,000 watts. A few days previously the figures were 223,000 watts.

The second zone had 114,000 watts when the commission took charge, and that number has been reduced to 109,000. A few days previously it was only 106,000 watts, so that already the commission is bowing to the demand for equality.

The third zone, which had 53,000 watts, was reduced to 47,000 watts, but since the discussion has been going on it has been brought back to 55,000, an increase of 2,000 over what it had when the commission began a year ago.

The fourth zone, which is the Middle West zone, where a great number of stations had sprung up, had 307,000 watts, which the commission cut to 171,000, although they had not left the first zone at 200,000, but increased it to 214,000 watts.

The fifth zone had 119,000 watts and was cut to 62,000, but recently has been raised to 77,000 watts.

I call attention to these figures to show that the commission did not attempt to equalize conditions at all. It has practically given no attention to that feature, but it has gone on the theory that when great organizations of capital representing great stations have come in and asked for added power it should be granted, while the little fellows, the independent stations, scattered throughout the country, have had their power reduced. They have been told there was no power available; that there were no wave lengths to be given them; and that there were too many stations on the air already. They defended their action by saying that other stations had been given enormous power and additional power could not be granted these other stations. That is the reason that the House was forced to adopt this provision and why the Senate conferees accepted it.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I go further than does the Senator from Washington and say that the figures to which he has just referred indicate conclusively that the commission has increased the discrimination instead of correcting it. The power allotted to the first zone has been substantially increased, while the power allotted to other zones has been substantially decreased. It seems to me that that table alone constitutes a serious indictment against the administration of the law.

I quite agree with the Senator from Washington that the fabric of the law seems to be good, but the administration of it has been far from the standard that should have been maintained; at least, that is my candid judgment about it. Along the line of what other Senators have said, I wish to say that the general complaint reaching me is that the service accorded ordinary radio users has been much less satisfactory; in fact, much more unsatisfactory under the present commission than it previously was.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator, Do the decreases marked upon the chart represent arbitrary decreases made by the commission?

Mr. DILL. I may say to the Senator they represent just exactly what the chart shows. They represent the amount of power that was in each zone when the commission took charge and the amount of power in each zone now.

Mr. COPELAND. That does not answer my question.

Mr. DILL. The Senator asked me if the decreases have been arbitrary. I may say in answer to that that they are the result of the commission's grants and refusals of increased power.

Mr. COPELAND. Is it not probable that in the fourth zone—I know nothing about it and I want the information—is it not probable that some of those stations voluntarily retired from the field?

Mr. DILL. Some of them did.

Mr. COPELAND. And on that account there is indicated on the chart a decrease?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. In other words, in the pioneer days of the industry, before it had developed as it has since developed, undoubtedly many concerns went into the business of broadcasting and then found that the expense involved was beyond their means. So when the Senator points out a decrease for the fourth zone and what appears to be an enormous lessening of power, it may well be that to a considerable extent that is due to the fact that these concerns of their own accord found it impossible to go on.

Mr. DILL. I wish to say, in view of the many applications for power in the fourth zone, as shown by the other chart, there being 181,000 watts applied for and only 41,000 granted, that, while it may be true that some of the decrease was caused by concerns that went out of existence, I think there were requests for far more power from stations in that area than there was power allowed.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator knows very well how misleading figures are——

Mr. DILL. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. Unless they are correlated and brought together. It might well be, as was pointed out a little while ago, that many applications were made where the applicants themselves found that they were not able to go forward. I have not in mind the State of the Senator from North Carolina, because it was not in his State, but my attention was called to an application in another State, an application filed in good faith by individuals who thought that they could actually establish a broadcasting station, but when they found that they had to spend a hundred thousand dollars or a hundred and fifty thousand dollars they ascertained at once that they could not do it. So I think that all these figures have to be brought together. They do look condemnatory——

Mr. DILL. They are condemnatory.

Mr. COPELAND. But I think they can be explained.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. It is remarkably strange that the conditions should be of one character in the fourth zone and entirely opposite in the first zone; that is to say, that the power in the fourth zone is decreased to a large extent and increased substantially in the first zone. It is wholly improbable that the decrease in the fourth zone is due to the applicants being unable to go forward, either from a financial standpoint or otherwise, whereas in the first zone all the applicants could and did go forward. In the table to the right it is shown that the commission had been requested for 181,000 watts plus and granted only 41,000. It is wholly improbable that that is due to the circumstances to which the Senator from New York has referred.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from New York, and then I should like to proceed with the discussion.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it does not seem strange to me at all. In New York, in the first zone, with three or four great big concerns using a great amount of power, some others came in that had abundant financial means to go on; but I can well understand, I want to say to the Senator from New Mexico, that it might have happened in the fourth zone, in the remote sections of that zone, that little stations which have sprung up found themselves utterly incompetent to compete with the broadcasting from Chicago or from some near-by point such as Minneapolis or St. Paul; they had no following, and the radio "fans" were not satisfied with the incomplete and, perhaps, unworthy programs offered by those small stations.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question, and then I shall not interrupt the Senator from Washington further.

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. I do not know so much about conditions in the third zone, but I do know something about them in a part of the fifth zone; and the complaint there is against chain broadcasting emanating principally from New York. The people there do not want that broadcasting. They prefer the independent stations; but under the administration of the law by the present commission they are barred from getting that which they want, and are compelled to submit to that which is highly unsatisfactory to them, namely, chain broadcasting coming principally from the stations in the first zone that are so strong that they practically put the small broadcaster out of business; and the people do not want these programs.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I say to the Senator from New York that the complaint made from the State of New Jersey is that your 50,000-watt power station there makes it impossible for a station in New Jersey, properly financed, to be heard, because the powerful station in New York absolutely puts it out of the air.

Now, I want to come down to the third zone. That is the zone in which my State is. I have been fighting this commission for a long while to get a permit to increase the power up to 3,500 watts. The man who wants it has spent considerably over $300,000. He advertises nothing. He is simply giving entertainments. He is a man of means.

Mr. MAYFIELD. What amount has he now?

Mr. BROUSSARD. While he was granted a permit of 1,000 watts, this commission called him here and required him to divide his time with a station in Iowa, while they were granting to the first zone everything they wanted. This man is now trying to get 10,000 watts. Why? Because these powerful stations in Chicago and New York absolutely silence his machine, and he must violate the law in order to be heard at all; and because he violates the law they refuse to give him 3,500 watts, while the commission sends agents to New Orleans and Memphis begging people there to apply for power that they will grant to them, though they are denying it to a man who already has a station.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is the situation there; and the explanation that the Senator from New York is offering is absolutely not applicable to this situation. These parties want more power. They can not get it; but permits are granted right and left to other sections of the United States, and the reason given for not increasing this power is that the other commissioners are not confirmed. The man from my zone is confirmed, however, and still we can not get anything.

Mr. DILL. Of course, the authorizations that may be made even by the commissioner from your zone would necessarily have to be approved by the commission. Whether or not he has attempted to do that, I do not know.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question.

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Does the Senator have reference to Mr. Henderson?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Of Shreveport; yes.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Could not the commission grant this application for additional wattage?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It could, but it does not do it.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Why not?

Mr. BROUSSARD. For various reasons that they assign. They want to see what will become of this law, whether or not this law will be enacted. They want to see whether the commissioners will be confirmed; but in the meantime, Commissioner Lafount is not confirmed, and he has been getting every increase.

Mr. MAYFIELD. And the commissioner from the third zone was confirmed last year.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes; he was.

Mr. MAYFIELD. And could grant this power.

Mr. BROUSSARD. And he is the only commissioner that is confirmed.

Mr. DILL. He could grant the power if the other commissioners would vote to approve his recommendations.

There is one other thing, Mr. President, that I want to call attention to, about the lack of equality of treatment. I have had set up here a chart showing a number of stations of different powers.

Under the 500-watt stations—those are the smaller broadcasting stations—the first zone has 58, the second 38, the third 47, the fourth 96, and the fifth 50.

When you go to 1,000 watts, the first zone has 17, the second 14, the third 13, the fourth 43, and the fifth 25.

When you go to 5,000 watts you are getting into responsible radio stations. You have 11 in the first zone, 5 in the second zone, 3 in the third zone, 15 in the fourth zone, and 4 in the fifth zone.

When you go to 10,000 watts you have five in the first zone, one in the second zone, none in the third zone, one in the fourth zone, and none in the fifth zone.

That shows the tremendous favoritism granted in favor of the medium high-powered stations, and shows again the necessity of some legislation to compel the commission to yield more equality of treatment.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

Mr. DILL. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on page 2 of this report I read this:

> That if and when there is a lack of applications from any zone for the proportionate share of licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, or station power to which such zone is entitled, the licensing authority may issue licenses for the balance of the proportion not applied for from any zone, to applicants from other zones for a temporary period of 90 days each, and shall specifically designate that said apportionment is only for said temporary period.

Would the Senator be willing to agree to a motion to recommit with directions to the committee to contend for the striking out, on page 1, of the words "service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide said equality," and also the words "when and in so far as there are applications therefor," and inserting in lieu thereof, just before the word "licensing," the word "and," so that the section will read as follows?—

> It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting, and the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones.

In other words, if that language is stricken out, under the proviso which I read first it is perfectly clear that the commission shall have the power to allocate to one zone unused power of another zone for temporary purposes, and that is all right; but does not the Senator think that the language in the first part of the section that I have read ought to be stricken out in the interest of clarity, especially when there has been a misunderstanding, or a claimed misunderstanding, of what the law was before; and ought we not now to make the law so plain that even the commission can understand what it is?

Mr. DILL. I should not want to agree to any such motion. The proposal which the Senator makes is to strike out the words "both of transmission and of reception"?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. DILL. I think those words should be in there, for the reason that when we said "equality of radio service" the commission took the attitude that service in the form of supplying programs from distant stations was complying with the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Now, when we say "both of transmission and of reception," and then go ahead to define what we mean by it, by dividing equally the licenses, the wave lengths, the station power, and the time of operation, we have made it so clear that, as the Senator has suggested, not even the commission can misunderstand it; and for that reason I think it would be a mistake to take out those words.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator agree to a motion to recommit, leaving in those words, but striking out the other words that I have read?

Mr. DILL. I must say to the Senator what I said before, that I do not think the other words have any effect at all. However, the majority of the House conferees wanted them in, and the House adopted this report without a roll call; and I think it would be a very serious mistake to think of committing it back to the conferees.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me call the Senator's attention to this situation: Those words were put into this bill for the purpose of establishing some sort of confusion, so that the commission could make a division that is not contemplated by the rest of the act. I say, further, that if there is any trouble about this equality of division, it will come from those words. Then, why should we put into this act words that admittedly are not necessary, and the Senator admits that they are not necessary? Why should we put them in there?

Mr. DILL. I may say that I think the request to put them in came from those who were opposed to this legislation originally, and the words were put in as much to save their face as anything else. That is all I could figure out of it. I repeat that I do not think they have any effect, except this:

The argument was made that without those words in there the commission must first sit down and take the 650,000 watts of power and divide it by five, allot so much to each zone, and then put it in cold storage, as it were, until there were applications made from other zones, and then redistribute it; while this would permit them to look at the applications, and if any zone lacked its proportionate share they could divide it in the beginning.

Mr. McKELLAR. Ah, Mr. President. The proviso is perfectly clear that the commission has the power to do what the Senator states that it was the purpose to have done; but the words here are confusing. They are conflicting. The Senator has called them surplus, but I want to say that the enemies of this legislation are not trying to save their face. They are trying to save their power. That is their purpose. It is not for the purpose of saving their face, in my judgment.

What they want is to save these great broadcasting stations that now have a monopoly of the air. That is what they are trying to do. They are not trying to save their face; and what we ought to do is to put in this act language which will convey our thoughts even to a Radio Commission, so that there can not be any misunderstanding about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. While I did not take as active a part in this conference as the Senator from Washington, and know very much less about it, I was present when this language was agreed on. I call to the attention of the Senator from Tennessee this language:

> It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio-broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception.

That is a plain statement of the law. Now, what is the rest of it?

> And in order to provide said equality—

This is method only, mind you. The other is the statement of the law. Now it comes down to the method of carrying it out. Please draw the distinction between the declaration of law and the method of carrying it out.

> In order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and station power, to each of said zones.

You can not carry out the law unless somebody applies for it.

> When and in so far as there are applications therefor.

Mind you, that provides the method of carrying it out. The first two sentences state there must be equality. From there on is the provision for the method—that is, that whenever there are applications, those applications shall be so granted as to carry out that equality.

For instance, going on a little further, the first zone to-day is far in excess of the third zone. It is impossible, until the applications from the third zone are filed, to bring about equality. If the language had been that there should only be equality as based upon applications, the Senator from Tennessee would be right, but it does not say that. It says that there shall be equality, but the method of arriving at the equality must depend upon applications. It is impossible to make it equal until somebody applies for it, and it says it shall be carried out whenever there are applications.

Mr. WATSON. That is, unless they arbitrarily assign 120,000 watts to each zone, whether anybody wants it or not.

Mr. PITTMAN. It can not be done.

Mr. WATSON. And leave it there unused.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the proviso toward the close of the section provides specifically that they can allot it.

Mr. WATSON. After a time. What the Senator from Tennessee wants is that each zone shall be allotted the same power in the beginning, whether anybody wants it or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the power in the commission to reallocate it where there are no applications for it. That language can not be misunderstood, it can not be distorted, it can not be misused, if that language goes in. The Senator will find that this bill will fail of the purpose for which it was drawn.

Mr. WATSON. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. DILL. I want to call attention to another thing. The language is "applications therefor," and it does not even require that they shall be applications that meet the other requirements of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. The proviso in the first place declares for equality among the zones.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the proviso. The proviso ought to be in the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. The other provision is that for the purpose of carrying this out licenses shall be granted equally, so far as there are applications therefor, but it does not disturb the first sentence, which provides that there shall be equality.

Why is that provision in there? Because if it were not there, there would be no restrictions on the length of time that they could let it in the other zone, but it limits them to three months. The provision is a limitation on the first part of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator is right.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me say one other thing before I take my seat. This bill, in the opinion of the Senate conferees, obtains what the Senate wants. It has been a very difficult proposition. It has been very difficult to get the House and the Senate together. I have been surprised that they have come together even to this extent.

What have we here? We have a declaration of the law of equality. We have a declaration that means that as the applications come in they must be granted to comply with that equality. We have a declaration that if there is not an application from the weak zone, No. 3, and there is from some other zone, that it shall be only a temporary one to the other zone, and expressly in the license stated that it is temporary.

It may be said that the commission may not carry out this law. Of course, it may not. Yet someone must be vested with this matter. It is a matter of detail. They have to keep track of the number of watts and the number of stations and everything in each of these zones for the purpose of carrying out this law. Someone must be vested with discretion in this matter, and we vest the commission with the discretion.

The Senate, for the protection of itself, provided that the life of this commission shall expire in February. After that there will be no commission. Consequently it will be up for reappointment. It went further than that. It said that until 1930 no license shall be granted for a longer period than 90 days. No matter how unfair these commissioners might be, no matter how many mistakes they might make, they will be mistakes that will be terminated at the end of 90 days, or, if the life of the commission is renewed, at the end of a period of six months. It is so fixed that they can not do irreparable damage.

They may, for instance, for a period of 90 days, do a wrong to one of the zones, but the licenses are for only 90 days' time. We have made plain by the bill and by the discussion what Congress means. The question is, Will this commission carry it out or attempt to? If they do not, then they can do injustice for a period of only 90 days at a time. When the licensees come back in February, the commission will be dead, and the President of the United States will not reappoint any of them if they have violated this law, and if he does reappoint them the Senate of the United States will not confirm them.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question for information?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think the life of the last commission expired on the 15th of this month. What would be the effect of the enactment of this measure? Would it revive the commission?

Mr. PITTMAN. It would revive the commission until February.

Mr. DILL. Until March 15th.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Of next year?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes. The life of the commission would expire on March 15th of next year.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the four great stations of New York, Schenectady, Boston, and Bound Brook were in existence before the commission was appointed, were they not?

Mr. DILL. They were.

Mr. HALE. Has the power of those stations been increased since that time?

Mr. DILL. I am not sure. I am not able to answer that without looking at my notes, but my memory is that there was an increase in power in WEAF that had been authorized by the Department of Commerce before the commission came in. I think a construction permit was issued to allow WEAF to be raised to 50,000 watts. That is my memory. The commission approved that when it came in.

Mr. HALE. On account of an arrangement that had been made beforehand?

Mr. DILL. Yes. It was under no compulsion to do that, and it is under no compulsion to leave it at 50,000. An increase at Schenectady has been allowed since the commission was formed.

Mr. HALE. A great deal has been said about the favored first zone. If we take out the 145,000 watts in effect at those four great stations in February, 1927, we would have had exactly 55,000 watts in that zone.

Mr. DILL. That is exactly true.

Mr. HALE. A considerably less number of watts than in any other zone.

Mr. DILL. But there were 45,000 watts not in use at that time. I think they would have had 100,000 watts in that zone.

Mr. HALE. But it was not all being used at that time.

Mr. DILL. The Senator means by other stations?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. DILL. It is the high-powered stations that have built up the first zone.

Mr. HALE. What I want to make clear is that it is the high-powered stations that make it appear that the zone is favored.

Mr. DILL. Yes, absolutely; and the other parts of that zone have suffered, just as other parts of the country have suffered.

Mr. HALE. Is there anything in the conference agreement that will cause the commission to cut down the stations outside of the four great stations?

Mr. DILL. I think not.

Mr. KING. And permit smaller stations to be established?

Mr. DILL. It provides—and shall make a fair and equitable allocation of licenses, wave lengths, time for operation, and station power to each of the States, the District of Columbia, the Territories * * * according to population.

Of course, it would give New York a major portion, but not such a controlling position as it now has.

Mr. HALE. In the Senator's opinion, would the reduction be made largely in these great stations, or in the small stations outside? We have very little power being used now in the stations outside.

Mr. DILL. I should think it would come in the big stations. There is no way of being certain about that. That is a matter that must necessarily be argued out with the commission. But I do not see how the commission could defend these high-powered stations continuing at the expense of the rest of the country in that zone.

Mr. HALE. We have less than our share at the outside stations now.

Mr. DILL. Undoubtedly; and the reason this zone has all this enormous amount of power is due to the high-powered stations that have been located there.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it true that if the commission saw fit it could leave the station at Schenectady with all its present power?

Mr. DILL. I doubt whether it can, under the equitable-allocation provision.

Mr. CARAWAY. Equitable allocation means whatever the commission want to say it means.

Mr. DILL. If the commission attempts to defy this law Congress will have its remedy, and I think Congress would be justified in exercising its power, after all of the discussion that has been had. It may be said in defense of the commission that the law was new; that there were differences of opinion; there was some doubt as to what Congress wanted; but there can be no doubt of the meaning of Congress now.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am at a loss to know how the commission could ever have interpreted the law as it did.

Mr. DILL. I am, too, with respect to the equitable distribution to the whole of the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the argument just now made by my friend from Washington was made when the present law was under consideration, namely, that the measure was clear and unmistakable, and that the commission would not dare to transgress it; that its duties were clearly mapped out, and that if they failed to live up to the requirements of the statute Congress had its remedy.

Now, my friend is making the same argument, for the same commission, at least some of them, that he made when the present law was under consideration. I was just wondering what the basis of his hope and his faith is for the proper interpretation of the law in the future, when there has been such a misinterpretation up to date.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is there any way possible by law to remove from the minds of announcers the belief that they are funny? I would particularly like to get rid of that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to ask a question of the Senator from Washington. I understand that the stations are to be licensed for only 90 days?

Mr. DILL. Yes. They are licensed for only 60 days at the present time, but they can not be licensed for more than 90 days.

Mr. OVERMAN. How about licenses now in existence?

Mr. DILL. They are for 60 days.

Mr. OVERMAN. For the stations in New York?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then any new station that is licensed will be licensed for 90 days?

Mr. DILL. It can not be for more than 90; it may be less.

Mr. OVERMAN. And after the license has expired, they must apply for another license?

Mr. DILL. They must apply for a renewal of license. I want to say to the Senator that we may criticize the commission for many things, but that is one thing in which they have certainly tried to protect the interests of the people. They have tried to improve the situation whenever it needed to be improved in that they have not granted any licenses for long periods of time.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to take very much of the time of the Senate in discussing the conference report. The situation is so vital and affects the people of the country in such a peculiar way that I feel justified in making a few observations with respect to conditions, and what I conceive to be the contributing causes thereto.

I think the discussion this afternoon has illustrated one fact beyond question, and that is that the country at large is displeased and dissatisfied with the present administration of radio, that new science which is having so much to do with disseminating knowledge and entertainment among people throughout the country. I think that members of the commission might well take note of that fact. If there is any section of the country that is satisfied with the present situation, unless it be the first zone, I am not acquainted with the fact.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I would not have the Senator believe that in the first zone there has not been dissatisfaction. There are a great many who have applied to me for assistance before the commission and I am frank to say that in most of those instances it was found that they did not have the financial backing and the wherewithal to make a success of the station. My purpose in rising was to make clear that New York by all means has not had everything it wanted in the matter of radio stations.

Mr. BRATTON. I appreciate the correction on the part of the Senator from New York. I accept it.

Mr. President, the situation is not free from its difficulties. Under the terms of the law we continue a commission already created for the purpose of administering the law. The first part of the amendment contained in the conference report declares a principle. It is declared in this language:

It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones which shall be established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception.

I think no one can dispute the fairness or accuracy of that declaration of principle. A fair and an equitable distribution of broadcasting service, both of transmission and reception, is all that the people can request or expect. The remainder of the provision has to do with details in carrying the declaration of principle into effect. That is all it does. It provides the details with which the principle shall be administered in this language:

and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor; and shall make a fair and equitable allocation of licenses, wave lengths, time for operation, and station power to each of the States, the District of Columbia, the Territories and possessions of the United States within each zone, according to population.

If the commission in administering the law will follow that mandate of Congress, there can be no serious inequality or injustice visited upon any section of the country. The bill first declares for a fair and an equitable distribution of the privilege and the power. The first declaration of administration in carrying out the principle is that the wave lengths and the other administrative features shall be allocated among the States, the District of Columbia, and the territories within each zone according to population. The proposed law then continues:

> The licensing authority shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, whenever necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, when applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses: Provided, That if and when there is a lack of applications from any zone for the proportionate share of licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, or station power to which such zone is entitled, the licensing authority may issue licenses for the balance of the proportion not applied for from any zone, to applicants from other zones for a temporary period of 90 days each, and shall specifically designate that said apportionment is only for said temporary period. Allocations shall be charged to the State, District, Territory, or possession wherein the studio of the station is located and not where the transmitter is located.

I have no complaint to make with the fabric of the law. I have said previously to-day, and I repeat it now, that I think the conferees have evolved a very satisfactory and wholesome law. I desire to compliment the members of the conference, particularly the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] for the painstaking and careful manner in which they have dealt with the subject.

What I am concerned about is the administration of the law, because if the future is to be judged by the past I think the masses of people of the country have just cause to be apprehensive that equitable treatment will not be accorded them, but that monopolistic control will continue to run rampant and with rampage throughout the country.

The figures, maps, and data furnished the Senate to-day are startling. I have received complaints about the constantly decreasing standards of service that have been accorded radio patrons throughout the country. It is easy to understand now why those complaints have been reaching us so frequently and so continuously. The suggestion that the members of the commission have been impotent and inert or anemic, so to speak, because they had not been confirmed, simply strikes at the intelligence of the Senate. That is no excuse nor justification. It does not appeal to anybody. They must know, as we know, that until they were confirmed or rejected they have the power to go forward and administer the law just as actively and faithfully as they would have after confirmation; not only that, it was their duty to do so, and any statement that they have failed to act because they have not been confirmed simply raises a doubt in the mind as to whether they should be confirmed. I shall content myself with making this statement: It raises a serious doubt as to whether they should be confirmed.

I think the independent broadcasters have not received fair nor equitable treatment. I think they have suffered an unjustified discrimination. I think no theory can be advanced which supports the treatment accorded the independent broadcasters in the country by the present commission. I do not say this as to all members of the commission, because I think their degree of fidelity has differed in a marked way. Some of them have been active. Some of them have met the responsibilities and duties of their office. Some of them have served their respective districts with a high degree of efficiency. But that can not be said for other members of the commission.

Mr. President, I intend to vote for the conference report, although I wish it were possible to accord the independent broadcasters of the country some safer mandate and greater assurance that they will receive better treatment than the present law grants them. I do not think that is possible now. I hark back to what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] said a few months ago, that the present law forbidding the issuance of any permit or license beyond a 90-day period protects the people of the country against any vested right that might operate to their injury upon a permanent basis. The present law gives the Congress the right to protect the people in the way of refusing to confirm the commissioners as and when their nominations reach the Senate for confirmation or rejection. The protection, therefore, is dual; it is two-fold. I think the people of the country must depend upon the commission to administer the law, upon the Congress to improve the law, and upon the Senate to protect them in carefully considering nominations for membership on the commission. If the present intolerable condition continues, if it is not corrected forthwith, if the commission continues to be impotent and inert, contending that it is impaled with nonconfirmation, I see but one thing for the Senate to do and that is to reject those assuming that attitude and have other commissioners appointed who will administer the plain mandate of the law, clearly amplified and interpreted by what has been said upon the floor of the Senate to-day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated that the Senate has the power to correct wrongs which may result from maladministration or misinterpretation of the law by refusing to confirm the commissioners who may offend. I am sure the Senator, upon reflection, will concede that this remedy is inadequate. He will recall many instances where the Senate has refused to confirm appointees of the President, not from partisan or capricious motives, but because it was believed they were incompetent or otherwise disqualified; but notwithstanding the Senate's action, the President reappointed them, sometimes during the term when they were rejected, and in some instances after the adjournment of Congress. In the cases I am referring to the rejected and reappointed persons continued to act as de jure and defacto officials until the next session of Congress, when their names were again transmitted to the Senate and they were again rejected. It seems to me that if the people are to be protected solely by the power of rejection by the Senate, it is rather a slender reed upon which to rest. In my opinion, with the experience which we have had, with the great amount of study which has been given to this important question by members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as well as by other Senators and by the other branch of Congress, a measure broad and comprehensive, one that would deal effectively with this important question, should be presented for our consideration.

It seems to me we are somewhat—shall I say derelict? That is too strong a word. We are not sufficiently cognizant of the evils from which the people are suffering in what I may call the radio world. Perhaps we are too indifferent to the injustices arising from the monopolistic control of a beneficent force or power, which like the air of heaven should be free to all. That some organizations have been too powerful and have sought and achieved monopolistic control of stations and wave lengths can not be denied. It is far from certain that the measure before us, which we are asked to approve, will secure justice and equality to individuals or sections of our country. It is conceded that the bill agreed upon by the conferees is defective and imperfect, but it is hoped that it will improve present conditions and that the commission charged with its enforcement will properly interpret its provisions.

Why not write a bill that will protect the people, that will carry out the wishes of Congress, that will inspire the confidence of the people in its justice and merits? Congress will be in session for several months, and it seems to me that we can serve the people in no better way than to recommit this bill and give the conferees further opportunity to consider it and all questions involved and to reframe the measure and bring back to the House and the Senate a bill which will be protective in all its provisions and just to all portions of the United States.

May I call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to the fact that the independent producers of the instrumentalities employed in the radio industry and business are being injured and in many instances destroyed by the Radio Trust? The testimony given before the Committee on Patents shows the power of this trust; the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] and other Senators have examined witnesses, and the information brought to the committee reveals the tyranny and the oppression of the trusts that have gotten the radio business by the throat. They have secured control of the instrumentalities used in the radio business, and the Electric Trust and the Radio Trust—and I differentiate the two—are oppressive, as are other trusts in the United States. We could, and perhaps we should, deny the use of any wave lengths or any license to a trust or monopoly. If a license were denied, it would ameliorate the condition and greatly relieve the people from the abuses from which they have suffered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, would the Senator from New Mexico be so good as to yield to me before the Senator from Utah takes his seat?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield with pleasure to my friend from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator. Does the Senator from Utah believe in a commission form of government?

Mr. KING. No; I detest and abhor commissions. The more commissions we have—and we have hundreds of them not only in the Federal Government but in the States—the sorrier is the condition of the people.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Utah remembers that I was one of the few who objected to the creation of the Radio Commission in the beginning, because I agreed with the Senator that it is a useless method of seeking remedies for diseases which can be cured in another way. We ought not to try to impose on a commission duties that belong either to the executive branch of the Government or to the legislative branch. It has given me a certain sad satisfaction to-day to hear the testimony that radio service has been worse since the law establishing the commission went into effect. When we read the RECORD of a year ago we find that great things were promised if we would only set up the Radio Commission.

I do not intend to prolong the debate or to keep my friend the Senator from New Mexico, who has so very generously yielded the floor to me, on his feet any longer than is necessary. I merely want to say that it seems to me a pity, in view of what the commission has done and has not done, that the committee of conference could not have written a different bill, so as to have arranged that Congress might grant the licenses in the different parts of the country, just as Congress to-day grants the licenses for the construction of bridges over navigable streams.

Congress does not give that power to a commission or to an executive officer of the Government. It is a minor matter, but such questions are brought to the attention of our committees, and no one complains that Congress interferes with the navigability of streams. If we can do that as to bridges over streams, why can we not do it in the much more important matter of saying who shall have the privilege of broadcasting through the air?

I had hoped that the committee of conference might work out some scheme whereby the Congress might grant the licenses after hearings by an impartial committee and then might place in the hands of an administrative officer of the Government the task we give to the War Department in the case of bridges of seeing to it that the licenses thus granted shall be properly used and that the "navigability" of the air, if I may use that expression, be not interfered with. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to say, in reply to the Senator from Connecticut, if Congress is going to allot the wave lengths, that we had better establish another House of Congress or not expect to do anything else in a legislative way when we meet here.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I have great respect for the views expressed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and for the views expressed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. I think there is much foundation for their statements, but we are now dealing with a conference report. That is the legislative situation. I repeat that the proposed law declares for a principle against which there can be no sound argument. At the outset it is stated:

> It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radiobroadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception.

That is the declaration of principle contained in the bill. Then the proposed law turns to the question of administering the principle thus declared. The Senator from Connecticut has discussed a matter of administering the principle declared in the bill. It may be that his suggestion of a better procedure or machinery to administer that principle is sound; it may be that it is better than the procedure proposed to be set up in the bill; but it would involve a great deal of thought, much research, and no small amount of labor; and under existing law, which confines licenses to periods not to exceed 90 days, no substantial injury can be sustained, because no vested, continuing right can be acquired.

If later in the present session of Congress or in the next session or thereafter it shall be determined that the procedure suggested by the Senator from Connecticut is more wholesome than the procedure established under existing law, Congress will be free to follow his suggestions and enact them into law. The same thing may be said in reply to the observations made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but our failure now to undertake to write a bill which will prescribe more in detail the administration of the law will not bring any permanent injury to anyone. The procedure will simply be confined temporarily to the duration of the present law and subject to remedy by legislation at any time hereafter.

Mr. President, I think those two factors add a larger degree of protection than merely the right to reject the nomination of commissioners as suggested by the Senator from Utah. If we were confined alone to that remedy, I should say that the public would not have adequate protection because if, when their nominations were confirmed by the Senate, the commissioners would have the right to establish a permanent condition, that would affect the people for all time, carrying with it the power of persons or corporations to acquire vested rights; the public, in my judgment, would not have any adequate protection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. From statements made during the debate, particularly by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], it would seem that the nominations of all of the commissioners except one should not be confirmed. I take it that the approval of this conference report will not commit the Senate in any way to the proposition that the nominations of all of the commissioners will be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. BRATTON. Certainly, Mr. President, I should not want now to be a party to any such agreement or committal. That is a separate matter. But what I had in mind and was endeavoring to say when the Senator from Utah rose to make his observation was that the power of the Senate to reject the nominations of commissioners, coupled with the added fact that the commission itself can not grant vested rights, so that it is impossible for persons to acquire vested rights under any act of the commission, because the licenses are temporary in duration—I think no permanent injustice can be visited upon the country under this bill. If any injustice is brought about, its duration can not extend beyond the life of the legislation itself. Thus the situation is always subject to correction by Congress.

Mr. President, I complain emphatically against the present situation. I think it can not be defended. Whether it is brought about by acts of commission or omission on the part of the commission I do not say. I think some of the commissioners should be absolved from any responsibility for existing conditions. Nevertheless I am entirely dissatisfied and complain in the most emphatic way about the situation in the country. Conceding all this, I think the conference report should be adopted because of the safeguards to which I have already adverted. I intend, therefore, to support the conference report sponsored by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], who have given this subject prolonged consideration and painstaking care. In my judgment they have devised a very wholesome piece of legislation.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have been very much gratified this afternoon with the arguments on the radio bill. I do not know when I have enjoyed so much pleasure. In the Sixty-ninth Congress, on the 18th of February, 1927, when the radio measure was before the Senate, I addressed the Senate regarding it. I am not a prophet nor the son of one, but I predicted then just what would happen if the radio bill which was then pending should be passed.

Any man, it seems to me, who realizes that we are living in a free country—or at least, we think we are, and that ours are a liberty-loving people—should begin to appreciate that they are tired of being restricted; they are tired of having the Congress of the United States deliberately, cold-bloodedly, with malice aforethought, steal all the powers which the sovereign States of the Union reserved to themselves when the bill of rights and the Constitution of this country were adopted and ratified.

I see there are two maps hanging on the wall. One of them is marked "relief map." Well, if that is relief, God save the people when they come to grief. I think the map over here [indicating] marked "chain stations" is very much more appropriate, because if there ever were a people being put in chains by its Congress the people of the American Nation may certainly be so described.

Why should we attempt to enact in this House cheap, petty, political legislation? I read into the RECORD in the Sixty-ninth Congress—and it is to be found on page 4155 of volume 68, part 4, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that Congress—a letter from a man connected, and very largely connected, with the radio business, in which he deliberately stated that if the radio bill then pending should be passed it would be the purpose of those who would have control of it to do just exactly what has been done.

Some Senators laughed at it. Some people said it should not have been put in the RECORD; it was folly. I notice now, 13 months afterwards, that the very Senators who stood upon this floor and laughed at that man about that article are standing here to-day and condemning that bill in as strong language as could be used upon the floor of the Senate and stay within parliamentary usages.

I noticed some time back a little article headed:

WATSON TAKES AIR—DEFENDS RADIO ACT

Senator JAMES E. WATSON, Republican, of Indiana, "took the air" last night in defense of the Federal Radio Commission.

Speaking from the studio of the National Broadcasting Co., WATSON recalled the chaos that existed at the time the radio act was adopted, reminded his invisible audience of the Herculean task that the commission has had in clearing the air, and said:

"And it is my deliberate judgment, after a careful survey of the entire situation, that the Radio Commission has fully justified its creation and that, notwithstanding the many disappointments that its decisions have occasioned, it ought to and will receive the unstinted support of a grateful people."

I knew then that when my very distinguished friend from Indiana—one of the ablest statesmen, I think, in this country, and a man who is very popular, and justly so—rallied to the defense of this baby, the bottle was just about empty of milk. I knew then that when he took his time off of Indiana and went out to make speeches in defense of this illegitimate child of somebody there was something hidden, something that had not yet been brought to light. But we have seen it to-day, and I have enjoyed seeing it very much indeed. Even one of their own cabinet, Mr. Jardine, had this to say about it:

JARDINE PROTESTS INTERFERENCE WITH FARMING PROGRAMS—SUGGESTS RADIO COMMISSION REFUSE WAVE LENGTHS THAT WOULD DISRUPT PLANS—MICHIGAN TO BROADCAST COURSE OF INSTRUCTION—HOME ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, AND ARTS TO BE INCLUDED IN LESSONS GIVEN

By Robert D. Heinl

If anything gets the worst of it in the merry war of further clearing up the ether this fall, it surely will not be the programs of the agricultural colleges. The first suggestion of this was a letter from Secretary of Agriculture Jardine to the Radio Commission. He suggested they refuse to grant wave lengths or increased power to any stations which might interfere with farm programs.

Another bit of handwriting on the wall was the appointment by President Coolidge to the Radio Commission of Sam Pickard, of Kansas, formerly in charge of the United States agricultural radio service.

Likewise, strong reinforcements will come from Representatives and Senators—and even the presidential candidates—who, especially ahead of the election next year, may be expected to champion the farmers' cause with unusual vigor.

However, it looks as if Secretary Jardine has beaten them all to it, for, although as far as anyone can recall the Federal Radio Commission has not refused any farm station anything it has asked for, he has evidently adopted a "you've-gotta-quit-kickin'-my-houn'-dog-around" attitude.

JARDINE SERVES NOTICE

Maybe Secretary Jardine didn't intend going as strong as that, but in what was construed in some quarters to be his ultimatum to the Radio Commission he said:

"The Agricultural Department understands that there are several cases before the commission in which commercial and private organizations are soliciting the commission to increase the strength of their stations and lengthen the period of sending, a situation which if complied with by the commission might result in seriously interfering with the cooperative public radio program of the department and the colleges.

"This is to suggest to the commission the desirability in the public interests of protecting the agricultural colleges against outside interference by refusing to grant to private concerns and commercial agencies power or wave length that would in any way interfere with present cooperative radio programs of the agricultural colleges and the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. Jardine went on to say that the Government at the present time is contributing annually about $7,000,000 in support of the agricultural college extension work. The State and county governments, in cooperation, are contributing $13,000,000 more annually in connection with the same work.

The Agricultural Department and the colleges are assisted in this work by about 200,000 farm men and women acting as local leaders, and 1,500,000 demonstrators. A large number of agricultural colleges are extending their agricultural service by means of radio.

FARM COURSE ANNOUNCED

An example of this is the broadcast by radio of the winter special courses from station WKAR by the Michigan State College of Agriculture at East Lansing. They are to begin January 10 and will run until May 1.

"During the 16 weeks, 32 courses, totaling 320 lectures, will be given by 124 men and women representing 20 departments of the college," John D. Willard, chairman of the Michigan State College radio committee, said. "This winter's schedule includes courses in agriculture, home economics, science, liberal arts, and engineering. Cordial acceptance of the radio offerings in the past two years leads the radio committee to the belief that WKAR can render the greatest service by using the 7 to 8 evening hour for courses of instruction and by using the noon hour for service broadcasts, special announcements, and informative lectures that are not parts of organized courses.

"Most of the radio courses offered this winter are supported by references to textbooks or bulletins, so that the listener may follow the subject more deeply. Such references will be mailed at the beginning of the course free of charge to any who ask for them.

"During 1927 the Michigan State College is undertaking a much wider service to the people of the State than has heretofore been possible. The office of continuing education has been established to make all parts of the institution useful to those who can not come to the college as resident students. Extension work in agriculture and home economics will be enlarged and strengthened. As funds permit, extension work in arts, science, engineering, and veterinary medicine will be developed. The radio courses are an important part of this plan of larger service.

"Reading courses and correspondence courses are in preparation, some being now ready for enrollment. It is the hope that before the close of 1927 the opportunity for a continuing of education may be made real to anyone in the State, regardless of isolation, distance from schools, lack of early educational opportunity, or other handicaps of location or occupation."

TOPICS TO BE DISCUSSED

Among the topics upon which special instruction will be given are poultry, forestry, fertilizers and manures, soil preparation, feeds and feeding, farm explosives, outlook for agriculture, forecasting the weather, chemistry in agriculture, and other subjects of importance to farmers.

Michigan State, of course, is but one of the many agricultural colleges now extending its courses by radio. However, the thoroughness with which its program for the forthcoming year covers the subject serves as a good example of what others are doing. And with this as a background, and such agricultural champions as Secretary Jardine, Commissioner Sam Pickard, and numerous Senators and Congressmen backing up the work, it may be readily imagined how it will be developed in years to come.

That article is from the Washington Post of Sunday, November 13, 1927.

I also have here an article from the Evening Star of Washington, D. C., of Friday, November 25, 1927, headed:

FARMER AND SMALL-TOWN LISTENER TO GET GOOD RADIO SERVICE, COMMISSIONER SAYS

The farmer and the small town listener are entitled to good radio service, and the Federal Radio Commission is going to see that they get it, says Sam Pickard, member of the commission from the Middle West.

"In the business centers and densely populated districts, where most broadcasting stations are located, listeners get good service," Pickard said. "Outside the larger cities, however, where distant stations must be relied on, particularly in the South and parts of the Middle West, reception often is poor."

Mr. Pickard's declaration of the commission's determination to protect the interests of the rural-radio fan was made in connection with the announcement that plans are under way to clear at least 40 channels of interference.

"To the farmer," he said, "radio means more than an appreciated form of entertainment. The radio service of the Department of Agriculture and of agricultural schools is regarded by many as a vital business adjunct. One hunderd and six radio stations, in 39 States and the District of Columbia, were broadcasting farm and home programs and the Department of Agriculture, November 1, all important in rural districts. Most farmers depend upon radio market reports for their business information, so it is vital that they receive without interference."

Thousands of farmers write to the department requesting programs having to do with the most economical way of fattening hogs for market, clover as a soil builder, improvement of country roads, control of disease in livestock, and hundreds of other farm problems. One farmer asked for information on whether "to sell or not to sell the farm."

Farmers have complained that they frequently miss portions of the talk due to static, faulty enunciation, or too rapid speaking. For this reason the department supplements the talks with printed information.

A North Carolina county agent quotes one of his friends as saying: "I wouldn't be without three things on the farm—radio, the telephone, and the automobile."

Listen, now, to what one man says. The Senator talks about what they are going to do if the commission does not do so-and-so. Why do you not do it now? What is the use of waiting when a man puts this kind of a statement in your face?

Commissioner Caldwell, stating that a great number of Senators had called upon him and the other members of the commission for the purpose of interceding for their constituents, but that they refused to do anything and that they proposed to rid the air of all so-called interference, Commissioner Caldwell stating that he was not responsible to anyone in the matter except to the President of the United States, and that what he was doing had the approval of the President.

If so, I am still more glad that the Senators who have spoken to-day have been so emphatic in their denunciation of the present law and the way in which it is being carried out; but, as has been well said by the distinguished junior Senator from Utah, if these men are not confirmed, if, as Mr. Commissioner Caldwell says, they are doing what the President of the United States wants them to do and is approving of their doing, there is not anything to keep him from reappointing them immediately on this commission and keeping them on the people. As he well said, appointments have been made; the Senate has refused to confirm; they have been held over until the next session; as soon as the Senate adjourned they have been reappointed, held over into the next session, and the second session and the third session have been used by one of the Presidents of the United States to keep a man in a public office. Finally, after keeping him there for several months, possibly two or three years, his friends, in order to get rid of this difficulty, persuaded him to send a distinguished colored citizen to Liberia and get him out of South Carolina, for which we thanked Mr. President Roosevelt very much indeed.

But why not send this report back, as was well said here? We have plenty of time. We are killing time now. It does not take a Senator to see that the Senate is killing time every day. We are merely wagging along. There is hardly ever a quorum present. Nothing is being done of any importance to the American people. Why? Because there is a presidential election right ahead, and neither side is particularly anxious to do anything. That is the truth, and the world knows it. We need not try to think that we are the only people that know it. Different bills are being sidetracked. Then can lie over, because neither the Democratic Party nor the Republican Party wants to act on them now, and take the responsibility before the American people in November.

If we are going to kill time, as has been well suggested, why not send this report back and let these gentlemen take it and write a bill that they are satisfied with? They themselves admit that they are not satisfied with this one. They themselves, the men who have studied it the most, the experts here, admit that it is not what they want.

No, Mr. President, it is not what the people want but it is what some interests want. It is what the people want who are controlling radio. It is what the people want who do not want anything but certain speeches to reach the American people during the summer. It is what some people want because they can choke this commission and make them do whatever they want them to do, to the detriment of thousands of American citizens who have a right to the same treatment in any section of the American Nation that any man or woman has in any other section of the American Nation. So why should we hurry?

Mr. President, I have some letters in this connection—one from the executive secretary of the Radio Protective Association, of Chicago, and another from the Technical Radio Laboratory, of New Jersey. In order to save time, I should like to ask that they both be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RADIO PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION (INC.),
Chicago, February 2, 1928.

Hon. C. L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Thank you for the interest you have taken in the fight to save the great radio art from the Radio Trust, and which you manifested by inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some important documents bearing on that fight.

I take the liberty of inclosing a pamphlet which sets out the case of the independent manufacturers against the Radio Corporation of America, as well as the resolutions passed by our membership at our Cleveland convention.

The Radio Protective Association is made up of outstanding independent manufacturers in the radio industry, and has sought by every means in its power to check the aggressions of the Radio Trust and to prevent the latter from destroying its independent competitors under the pretense of an alleged patent situation.

Our members will appreciate your continued interest in this fight. So will the American people, for there can be no greater menace to a republic than a monopoly of so important a means of mass communication as the radio.

We understand that hearings will be held by the Senate Committee on Patents next Wednesday on the bill introduced by Senator DILL, which would forfeit the patents of corporations convicted under the antitrust laws. The enactment of that measure into law would be a most formidable weapon against the Radio Trust, which has been a notorious offender in this abuse of patents.

I hope that you will find it possible to attend those hearings.

Sincerely yours,

OSWALD F. SCHUETTE,
Executive Secretary.

TECHNICAL RADIO LABORATORY,
OPERATING RADIO WTRL STATION,
December 23, 1927.

Hon. COLEMAN L. BLEASE,
Senator from South Carolina, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Do you realize how the Federal Radio Commission has throttled radio broadcasting?

Do you realize that the commission has practically deeded the air to the national broadcasting group?

The situation merits inquiry and action on your part, particularly in view of the fact that the commissioners responsible therefor are about to come up before you for confirmation of their appointments—Commissioners Caldwell and Pickard.

Let us illustrate the situation of the small broadcaster by our case:

We operate a broadcasting station at Midland Park, Bergen County, N. J., call letters WTRL, which the commission has restricted to a very small station, on a channel of 1,450 kilocycles, or 206.8 meters, and power of 15 watts. You can appreciate that this channel and power are so low as to make the station practically unusable.

Since last June we have been trying to obtain a usable channel from the Federal Radio Commission and also an increase in power, but we have only been met with rebuff after rebuff and we have come to a strong realization that a small broadcaster might just as well butt his head against a concrete wall as to try to get anything from the Federal Radio Commission.

The situation created by the commission is extremely unfair and unjust and merits your attention, because the commission has and is discriminating against the small broadcasters of New Jersey, and the rest of the country, in their campaign to grant a complete monopoly of the air to the National Broadcasting group, which is dominated by the Radio Corporation of America.

For the purpose of helping out the commission and getting away from the New York congestion, we applied to the commission to move the station to Long Branch, but on encountering opposition from the Asbury Park station, we decided to move to Trenton and apply for channel 770 kilocycles, after consulting our engineers, one of whom, Paul E. Ware, is one of the leading radio engineers of the country. At first we took the matter up with Commissioner Caldwell of New York, and after the usual "buck passing" on his part, he finally told us to consult our engineers and select wave length, which we did, selecting said wave length of 770 kilocycles. When we submitted this wave length to him, he hemmed and hawed and thought that it would cause interference with three stations in Chicago. We immediately consulted our engineers again and obtained written reports to show that there would be no such interference.

When we showed these letters to Commissioner Caldwell and formally applied to the commission for this channel of 770 kilocycles, then for the first time and out of a clear sky, and apparently in furtherance of their elimination of the small broadcaster in New Jersey, Commissioner Caldwell informed us that New Jersey had greatly exceeded the power to which it was entitled, and that it had approximately 48,000 watts. We immediately called his attention to the fact that he was doing New Jersey a grave injustice by charging us the power of the New York stations, which merely have their plants in New Jersey, and their stations and studios in New York and who are regarded by the radio industry and the public, and also by the commission, as belonging to New York, which stations have approximately 40,000 watts out of the 48,000, and that this was discrimination and certainly did not show that the commission was acting equitably in the matter.

It is plainly manifest that the commission has absolutely decided irrespective of the legal and property rights of small broadcasters, and without giving any consideration to their taking of their property without the constitutional due process of law and compensation, to set aside the air for the National Broadcasting group.

The commission (in public announcements and according to a letter which our attorneys hold of Commissioner Caldwell, dated October 24, 1927) has formulated a policy to drive off the air all small broadcasters in channels from 300 meters (which is the beginning of the good channels) to 550 meters (which is the highest channel), there being approximately 40 wave lengths in these channels, 90 per cent of which have been exclusively granted to stations of the National Broadcasting group, and which have full time and power running as high as 50,000 watts. When you realize that the National Broadcasting group operates two chains which only require two channels for their broadcasting, instead of the 35 or 36 given to them, one realizes how unfair the commission has been to the small broadcasters and that a monopoly has been created, in the name of the Government, of this remarkable and important method of communication.

By a very clever and one-sided publicity bureau maintained in Washington, the public has only received the commission's viewpoint of broadcasting and the necessity for eliminating the hundreds of stations, so as to give the radio public a great variety of noninterfering programs, when, in fact, this variety has been reduced to two programs and is solely in the interest of establishing a monopoly of the air in favor of the said group.

Editorial opinion is awakening to the fact and is beginning to wonder why the commission desires to eliminate practically all the small broadcasters when the operation of several stations have shown that several stations may broadcast on the same channel and in the same vicinity without any interference whatsoever.

On December 6, 1927, an editorial appeared in the Newark Evening News which reads in part, as follows:

"The art of broadcasting is definitely limited for a long time to come to some ninety 'communication channels.' The number of stations which may comfortably operate within these ninety-odd channels is variously estimated as lying between 150 and 450. The interesting thing at this time comes in the form of an announcement from Washington that the Federal Radio Commission may exterminate half of the existing stations.

"Certain facts with respect to present operation and the present state of the art are generally well known. Among these, two now stand out. First, broadcasting stations which regularly tie in with three major chains reach a total of about 65, and in so doing cover some 60 of the total of ninety-odd available channels. Second, stations WBZ at Springfield and WBZA at Boston have been in simultaneous operation, utilizing the same channel, for close on to a year, with complete success and unexpectedly gratifying results.

"It is but natural that one ask why all stations tied in with a chain can not utilize the one channel. It is possible technically. It is actually now being done. The expense involved can not serve as an excuse. It is vanishingly small as compared to the magnitude of the immediate benefits which would derive to the chain broadcasters themselves, the public, and the art as a whole."

Just appreciate our position. Here we are a small broadcaster in New Jersey; eminent engineers advise us that 770 kilocycles is an open channel, we apply for this channel, and the commission first advises us that they can not give us this channel, because they have cleared this channel for one large national group, and that it may cause interference with three stations in Chicago, thousands of miles away, when our engineers, one of whom is one of the most eminent in the country, explodes this reason; then the commission tells us that New Jersey has too much power, and for this reason denies our application.

Is this fair to a citizen of the United States?

So as to substantiate our statements, we have prepared and inclose a blue print showing the extreme favoritism and partiality which has been given to the large group, to the detriment and exclusion of the small broadcasters.

When our attorneys wrote a vigorous letter to Commissioner Caldwell, calling his attention to this situation, he had the temerity to offer us a public hearing, and also to write us that reports had come to him that we were off the air, etc. We immediately advised the commissioner, so greatly interested in the public convenience, etc., that we did not propose to go through the futile performance of a public hearing, by which we could hope to gain nothing except to give the commission an opportunity to build up a case upon which to base the decision which they already made against us, and also advising him that the reports which he had received were entirely erroneous and were apparently inspired by the persistency of our application for use of channel 770 kilocycles.

Commissioners Caldwell and Pickard have been unduly harsh and severe, and have practically crushed the small broadcaster. Commissioner recently made statement that commission was now "hard-boiled" and would proceed further and wipe out still more, 300 of the 600 stations. What an outrage this will be if permitted.

You have many great national problems to consider, but radio broadcasting is also a great national problem and one that holds forth such a great opportunity for enlightenment and improvement; and the commission should not be permitted to throttle the same and destroy the rights of small broadcasters.

The commission apparently does not give a "hoot" for anyone, Commissioner Caldwell stating that a great number of Senators had called upon him and the other members of the commission for the purpose of interceding for their constituents, but that they refused to do anything and that they proposed to rid the air of all so-called interference; Commissioner Caldwell stating that he was not responsible to anyone in the matter except to the President of the United States, and that what he was doing had the approval of the President.

We feel that the attention of every Senator should be called to this situation, and we are therefore sending a like letter to every United States Senator. This may result in the commission giving the small broadcasters the consideration to which they are entitled, and also result in a fair and equitable solution of the radio broadcasting problem in accordance with the spirit, as well as the letter, of the Federal radio act.

We beseech your interest and cooperation.

Respectfully yours,

TECHNICAL RADIO LABORATORY,
By D. W. MAY, General Manager.

Mr. BLEASE. I also hold in my hand resolutions adopted at the convention of the Radio Protective Association held at Cleveland, Ohio, December 7, 1927, in which they set out some of the abuses and some of the facts; and accompanying it is a resolution addressed to the honorable the Federal Trade Commission of the United States, asking for relief in this matter, which I also ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Resolutions adopted at the convention of the Radio Protective Association held at Cleveland, Ohio, December 7, 1927

RADIO PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION (INC.),
134 South La Salle Street, Chicago.

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Whereas the framers of the Constitution of the United States, to stimulate and foster creative ability and genius by rewarding inventors, gave Congress the power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries," and pursuant to that power Congress has by patent statutes given to inventors, for limited periods, the right to exclude others from using, making, and selling the specific invention described in a specific patent; and

Whereas Congress has forbidden combinations in restraint of interstate commerce and attempts to secure monopolies, and the courts have repeatedly held that patents did not give a license to anyone to combine in violation of such antitrust laws; and

Whereas, nevertheless, the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the General Electric Co., the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., and other companies, under the pretense of a patent situation, have entered into agreements with each other under which they have eliminated all competition between themselves, have pooled the patents which they have acquired from a long list of original inventors in the Radio Corporation of America, and have agreed to pool all future patents they may acquire in the same corporation, regardless that many of these patents cover inventions which are in competition with each other; and

Whereas the alleged or prima facie rights granted by these patents to exclude others from making specific commodities have been so combined as the weapons of a conspiracy, backed by capital running into the billions of dollars, thus creating a show of power and resources that has been used to intimidate and oppress independent factors in the industry by imposing serious financial and engineering restrictions upon their freedom of action; and

Whereas—to cite but one instance of these monopolistic attempts—by exclusive agreements with 95 per cent of the avenues of distribution, the aforesaid Radio Trust has attempted to monopolize the manufacture of the radio vacuum tube, which, although the patents thereon have expired, is the fundamental invention that has made all radio progress possible; and

Whereas all of these illegal agreements and conspiracies have had the same object of monopolizing the radio industry, of destroying the freedom of competition therein, and of wiping out the independent manufacturer as well as the independent dealer and jobber; and

Whereas this perversion of the American patent system has and always will cast a deadly blight over the very inventive genius which it was intended to inspire with new courage and ambition; and

Whereas these restraints of trade have already greatly damaged the aforesaid independent manufacturers and merchants and have done even greater injury to the public by increasing the prices of receiving sets and other radio devices and have placed a cloud over the development of the entire industry; and

Whereas radio is the greatest social invention since the days of early Egypt and has the greatest social, political, and cultural implications for the masses of the people in the United States and throughout the world: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Radio Protective Association, in convention assembled in the city of Cleveland, as the organization of the independent radio industry of the United States, That we do hereby petition the Senate and the House of Representatives to investigate the attempts to concentrate this great social art in the hands of a monopoly which is seeking to stifle its development, and further, to the end that the patent system may no longer be used to destroy the freedom of interstate commerce in the United States, to enact additional legislation which shall provide that individuals, firms, or corporations who may combine the alleged specific rights, given them by specific patents, to eliminate competition among themselves and thus attempt to "patent" an entire industry, shall for such wrongful use of these statutory grants, forfeit these patents in a manner similar to that provided by the act regulating the issuance of broadcasting licenses under which a broadcaster convicted of a violation of the antitrust statutes shall forfeit his rights to broadcast; and that these patents, upon such a conviction, shall be declared to have ceased to exist as such and to have become public property.

To the honorable the Federal Trade Commission of the United States:

Whereas your honorable body is now engaged in the investigation of the illegal pool of competitive patents and the illegal agreements under which said pool was formed, created, and entered into by the Radio Corporation of America, the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the General Electric Co., and the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., and other companies, better known as the Radio Trust, which exists in restraint of the freedom of interstate commerce and in violation of the Clayton and Sherman laws; and

Whereas your honorable body has also undertaken to investigate the violation by said Radio Trust of the Sherman and Clayton antitrust laws by certain illegal requirements imposed on its patent licensees under the so-called "tube clause" of its license agreements with other radio set manufacturers; and

Whereas said Radio Trust has not confined its efforts to restrict, in violation of the law, the freedom of commerce in radio between the several States, but has also, by illegal agreements with foreign corporations, sought to destroy and restrain the radio business of American receiving set and socket power and tube manufacturers with a foreign country, to wit; the Dominion of Canada; and

Whereas the Radio Trust has thus done irreparable damage to the radio manufacturers of the United States by the destruction of the major part of their commerce with the Dominion of Canada: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Radio Protective Association, in convention assembled in the city of Cleveland, as the representative of the independent radio industry of the United States, That we petition your honorable body to cause immediate steps to be taken to investigate these illegal agreements with foreign corporations to destroy said commerce of the independent manufacturers with the Dominion of Canada, and that your honorable body proceed at once to the fullest extent of the authority granted by law to compel said Radio Trust to cease and desist from such efforts to interfere with this commerce with the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BLEASE. I also have a statement entitled "The truth about the patent situation and Radio Trust," sent out by the Radio Protective Association of Chicago. It is not very long. It is in pamphlet form and contains letters from different people in Chicago and New York who know what they are talking about, people who know exactly what the situation means, and the terms of the agreement. I ask that that be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is, as follows:

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE PATENT SITUATION AND THE RADIO TRUST

(Some interesting correspondence from the files of the Radio Protective Association, 134 South LaSalle Street, Chicago)

The Radio Protective Association was organized by a group of outstanding independent manufacturers to oppose the efforts of the Radio Corporation of America to obtain a monopoly of the radio industry under the pretense of an alleged patent situation.

It is incorporated under the laws of Illinois and the charter recites its purpose to be "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts in so far as they apply to radio, and to preserve the freedom of said science and useful art." This wording is taken from the paragraph of the Constitution of the United States which sets out the only basis on which Congress is authorized to make patent laws.

The headquarters of the Radio Protective Association are at 134 South LaSalle Street, Chicago.

WHY WAS STATEMENT SUPPRESSED?

The statement of the case of the independent manufacturers against the Radio Corporation of America, which figures in this correspondence, was prepared by the Radio Protective Association at the request of the editor of Radio Retailing, published by the McGraw-Hill Publishing Co., of New York City.

But its editor suppressed the statement prepared in response to his request, and the Radio Protective Association believes that its members are entitled to know the reason given by the editor for that suppression.

TEXT OF THE CORRESPONDENCE

The following correspondence tells its own story:

RADIO PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION,
134 South La Salle Street, Chicago, August 25, 1927.

EDITOR RADIO RETAILING,
Tenth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Ten days ago Mr. Sutliffe, your western editor, asked us for a statement that would set out comprehensively and in detail the position of the independent manufacturers in reply to the interview you published in Radio Retailing for August with Mr. Sarnoff, of the Radio Corporation of America. Mr. Sutliffe called our attention to the statement which you had printed in connection with Mr. Sarnoff's interview:

"In fairness to both sides of the patent controversy, the editors have made every attempt possible to obtain a statement from a number of the leading 'independents,' as well as from the Radio Corporation of America. Up to the time of going to press, however, several of the largest independent manufacturers who were approached by the editors were unwilling to make any kind of a presentation of their case for publication at this time. We still hope that it may be possible to persuade some spokesman for this group to outline definitely the case for the independents."

In response to this request, and with the assistance of Mr. Ernest R. Reichmann, our general counsel, we drew up a statement which set forth the position of the independent manufacturers who make up our membership. Mr. Sutliffe sent this to your office and we are now surprised to learn from him that you are unwilling to publish it.

We find it difficult to understand this attitude because we have also had letters from a number of our members inclosing your letter of August 9 asking them their position in this controversy. In your letter you say:

"We believe that the independent manufacturers have a strong and just case, but so far no spokesman for the independents has had the courage to come out and definitely uphold their cause."

When we gave our statement to Mr. Sutliffe we wrote these members and told them that we had given you a statement of the position of the independent manufacturers, and we believed they would feel that this would represent their position when they read it in Radio Retailing.

For this reason it is difficult to understand your present position, particularly in view of your statement, "so far no spokesman for the independents has had the courage to come out and definitely uphold their cause!"

Can you give us an explanation that we may send to our members?

Sincerely yours,

OSWALD F. SCHUETTE,
Executive Secretary

STATEMENT DISPLEASES EDITOR RADIO RETAILING

MCGRAW-HILL PUBLISHING CO. (INC.),
Tenth Avenue at Thirty-sixth Street,
New York, N. Y., August 29, 1927.

Mr. OSWALD F. SCHUETTE,
Radio Protective Association,
134 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. SCHUETTE: We believe if the writer could sit down and have a chat with you regarding the Radio Corporation of America controversy that you would appreciate more clearly the reason why Radio Retailing feels it is not in the interest of the radio industry to publish the statement which you sent to us.

First of all, we believe what is needed now more than a rehash of gossip and rumors is a definite and logical statement of facts which will set forth the independents' position. For example, we understand there is some valid evidence concerning the background of the Alexanderson patent which would be permissible in a defense in court.

While we are just as apprehensive as your members regarding the possibilities of a monopoly in this industry, we do not believe any good will come of our giving over editorial space to hearsay. We are quite sure there is some one on the side of the independents that will contribute constructive thinking on the present crisis, which we must confess, is not contained in your statement.

If you can prepare for us a concise statement, let us say of the defense which Mr. Reichmann would undoubtedly put up in the event of a suit against one of the independents, Radio Retailing would be only too happy to have the opportunity of printing it. Of course, we believe in justice to our readers that the statement should give the names of the companies that you are representing.

Hoping that you will find it possible to contribute an article of fact rather than one which indulges in personalities, we are Very cordially yours,

WILLIAM C. ALLEY.

A REPLY TO THE EDITOR

RADIO PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION,
134 South La Salle Street, Chicago, September 8, 1927.

Mr. WILLIAM C. ALLEY,
Radio Retailing, McGraw-Hill Publishing Co.,
Tenth Avenue at Thirty-sixth Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. ALLEY: We have your letter of August 29, explaining why Radio Retailing would not use the statement which we prepared, at your request, as the answer of the independent manufacturers to the interview you printed in the August issue of Radio Retailing, with Mr. David A. Sarnoff, vice president and general manager of the Radio Corporation of America.

Your explanation of your refusal to print that answer is even more amazing than the refusal itself. For in it you say: "What is needed now more than a rehash of gossip and rumors is a definite and logical statement of facts. * * * We do not believe any good will come of our giving over editorial space to hearsay."

The statement we prepared for you contains not a single line of gossip, or "rumors," or hearsay. It confines itself exclusively to the egally established facts that underlie the radio situation, taken from the records in the hands of the United States Government and the courts and including the terms of the Radio Corporation of America license agreements which Mr. Sarnoff said in your own interview were "well known to the radio trade."

True, these are the very facts which the Radio Corporation of America is now most anxious to keep out of the minds of the great radio buying and listening public. For that public constitutes the final court of appeals in this issue.

Nor does our statement "indulge in personalities" as you say in your letter. In charity, we can only express the belief that maybe, after all, you have not even read it. There is no personality in it. It refers to Mr. Sarnoff, courteously, and by name, only because it was an interview with him which you asked us to answer.

It is truly a remarkable suggestion on your part that the statement should have contained the "valid evidence concerning the background of the Alexanderson patent which would be permissible in a defense in court," or "the defense which Mr. Reichmann would undoubtedly put up in the event of a suit against one of the independents." Surely no sane person would publish, in advance of trial, his defense to a possible lawsuit. But we concur in your "understanding" that there is such "valid evidence," for it always happens in litigation that receives much public attention that a great deal of new and unexpected testimony comes to light.

Are we to infer from your suggestion concerning this evidence in the Alexanderson patent that it is the position of Radio Retailing that, in the event one patent can be established, then all the questions arising out of the creation of an illegal pool of patents and the subsequent licensing by that patent pool of its competitors under agreements destroying the independence of these competitors are no longer open to investigation by the Congress, the Federal Trade Commission, or the courts? Is it your position that such a decision in one patent suit would prevent the Department of Justice from prosecuting an attempt to monopolize an entire industry and to apportion it among the parent companies of the pool in violation of the Sherman and Clayton antitrust laws?

Or, does Radio Retailing believe that had an ordinary radio manufacturer, worth, say, $500,000, owned the Alexanderson patent that he could thereby have placed the entire industry under one control and domination? Could he, with that patent, have consummated a monopoly of the tube business? Could he have levied a "tea tax" of 7½ per cent on all parts and accessories used by his competitors in their sets?

Regarding your request for the names of our members, we explained to your Mr. Sutliffe that all of our members had not consented to the publication of their names, but we did give him enough names of outstanding figures in various manufacturing divisions of the industry, among our members, to demonstrate beyond debate that we were a reputable and responsible organization, with real authority to speak for the independents. The oppression now existing in the industry, which courts have always found to be symptomatic of monopoly, is such that, in the light of your attitude as revealed by your letter, we see no reason why we should now confide our membership list to you.

But far beyond any of these questions, your letter reveals what you may have tried to conceal, that it is really our conclusions which you do not desire to publish. That is probably why you say you can not find any "constructive thinking on the present crisis" in the statement. We would be glad to debate the soundness of these conclusions with you in any forum and at any time.

For their is just one issue at stake in the radio industry. That is the issue between monopoly and free competition; the issue between those who defy the antitrust laws and those who seek their enforcement.

This letter may seem long to you. It would be if it were addressed only to you. But it is not. It is addressed also to our members to whom we feel that we owe an explanation of the policy which has prompted you to suppress the statement you asked for, after you had circularized them with the declaration that you had found no "spokesman with courage" among the independent manufacturers.

We probably do not need to tell you that other editors have not been so timid about publishing the truth in this controversy.

The battle has just begun!

Yours, for a free industry,

OSWALD F. SCHUETTE,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. OSWALD F. SCHUETTE,
Executive Secretary Radio Protective Association,

DEAR MR. SCHUETTE: Answering your letter of September 3, let me reiterate Radio Retailing's willingness to publish any clear-cut, straightforward statement of the position of the independent manufacturers in the patent situation, said statement to be signed by some prominent radio manufacturer whose name will carry weight with the industry.

We will not publish anything that constitutes a libelous attack on any corporation. We will publish, as I have said many times before, a clean-cut statement of the independents' position that does not indulge in what politicians would call "mud slinging."

Your statement may read all right to you, but to some one looking at it from a cold, disinterested standpoint it seems harsh, bitter, and acrimonious. We know you would not want your name to be associated with any article that read like "sour grapes."

Yours for a clean fight and a free industry,

TEXT OF THE SUPPRESSED STATEMENT

It would be pleasant if wars could be won with perfume and sweet language. But that the members of the Radio Protective Association may judge for themselves whether the statement prepared in their behalf is a "clear-cut, straightforward statement" of their position or "a rehash of gossip and rumors," or "hearsay," or "personalities," the text of the statement suppressed by Radio Retailing is here printed in full:

[From the Radio Protective Association, 134 South La Salle Street, Chicago]

By Oswald F. Schuette, executive secretary

The case of the so-called independent radio manufacturers against the Radio Corporation of America rests upon a vital and fundamental principle that is important to all American industry. Ever since the Sherman antitrust law was passed in 1890 attempts have been made to evade its purpose by private corporations under the pretext of patent ownership. The fundamental social doctrine of the United States, guarded zealously by its statutes and its courts, is that monopoly destroys both industry and democracy.

There is voluminous evidence in the archives of Congress and in such text compilations as Vaughn's Economics of our Patent System (MacMillan, 1925) that the concentration of control over an industry under one balance sheet stifles and suppresses the art of the industry. Developments which threaten to make existing assets obsolete are placed on the shelf and inventors find it useless to deal with the one existing customer.

PATENTS MUST PROMOTE PROGRESS

Under the Constitution of the United States, the patent laws are written to promote the progress of science and the useful arts. The patent statutes are designed to stimulate invention, and the use of patents to obtain a contrary effect is a perversion of these laws. Furthermore, the courts have held that patents do not give a license to anyone to escape the prohibitions of the Sherman and Clayton antitrust statutes, and have held, therefore, that the pooling of competing patents, resulting in the restraint of trade, is illegal.

In this light let us examine the position of the Radio Corporation of America and the independent radio manufacturers. Almost a year after the armistice, in the turmoil still existing in the Washington departments of the Government, the Radio Corporation of America came into being, and now the Radio Corporation claims it was created "at the request of the Government"! As a matter of fact, the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the radio industry, made in 1923 (p. 16), reveals that Secretary Daniels refused to sanction the Radio Corporation plan, stating that he believed in Government ownership of radio and that only Congress could authorize such a move. Apparently the officials of the War Department also refused to sanction this plan.

According to this report, when the formation of the Radio Corporation of America was first discussed with the Navy officials in the spring of 1919 it was planned only to authorize the General Electric Co. to buy existing Marconi patents and pool them with the General Electric Co.'s inventions. This was actually accomplished in October, 1919, and the Radio Corporation was incorporated. It was not until July, 1920, that the patents of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and its subsidiary, the Western Electric Co., were put into the pool, and another year—in June, 1921—that the patents of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. and its subsidiary, the International Radio Telegraph Co., were absorbed under a series of agreements which practically divided the ownership and control of the Radio Corporation among the General Electric Co., the Westinghouse Co., and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

AN ILLEGAL POOL OF COMPETING PATENTS

As a result, there were pooled in the hands of the Radio Corporation approximately 1,000 radio patents and the parent companies entered into a series of agreements with the Radio Corporation and with each other that are of the greatest significance and importance to the radio industry, and to which we refer in detail hereafter.

With reference to whether the patents so pooled were competing patents, let us consider here only a few radio-circuit patents. The alleged superheterodyne, the tuned radio-frequency, and the regenerative patents were among those pooled. David A. Sarnoff, vice president of the Radio Corporation of America, in Radio Retailing for August, 1927, referring to the superheterodyne circuit declares that "it is the one element of our line that most distinguishes it from competitive radio equipment." Judge Thacher, in the Atwater Kent case, in supporting the contention of the Radio Corporation, held that the Westinghouse Co.'s Armstrong circuit, alleged to cover regeneration, was "utterly different" from the Alexanderson patent, owned by the General Electric Co. and alleged to cover tuned radio-frequency.

It certainly should not be difficult for radio engineers to conclude that among 1,000 patents there must be a number of similarly interesting examples of competitive inventions.

DISREGARDING THE ANTITRUST LAWS

As conclusive evidence of the total disregard by the Radio Corporation of America and its parent companies of this fundamental and far-reaching principle of our antitrust laws, we point to the clause recurring with startling and significant emphasis in all the agreements between the Radio Corporation of America and the parent companies and between the parent companies themselves, providing for the pooling of "all future inventions." It is hard to imagine any future radio invention which would not be competitive with what has already been developed.

Another important detail in these agreements was the careful division in the activities of the parent companies, whereby they eliminated competition among themselves. To the General Electric Co. was apportioned 60 per cent of all the manufacture of commercial receiving apparatus, including tubes. To the Westinghouse Co. was allotted 40 per cent.

The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. was given the exclusive right to all commercial activity in wireless telephony. What does this promise for the development of wireless telephony in the United States? We are still using telephone apparatus developed 30 years ago, although many improvements have been made in the art and have long been in use in Europe. Wireless-telephone service is already installed on fast German trains for the use of passengers.

Now, after all these steps toward a monopoly, we find the Radio Corporation, according to Mr. Sarnoff's interview in Radio Retailing for August, 1927, "licensing competitors under patents necessary for the type and character of sets upon which they (the competitors) have built their business." In the New York Times of August 12, 1927, Mr. Sarnoff also said that "it is the policy of the Radio Corporation to encourage legitimate competition."

TERMS OF LICENSE AGREEMENTS

Mr. Sarnoff says in the same Radio Retailing interview that the terms of the licensing agreements are well known to the radio trade. What are they? In substance a licensee agrees to pay a royalty of 7½ per cent of his invoice price of radio sets, including cabinets, speakers, socket-power equipment or batteries, and other accessories, with a minimum guarantee of $100,000 for a period of four and one-half years; this, for the privilege only—and this is of the utmost importance—of making tuned radio-frequency receivers. He is licensed to use only his present manufacturing facilities and the license agreement can not inure to the benefit of assigns, successors, or legal representatives of the licensee without the written consent of the Radio Corporation of America. In other words, consolidation and amalgamation of the licensee are at the option of the Radio Corporation of America. Mr. Sarnoff has said he intends to control the entrance of any new aggregation of capital into the radio business, and that is the meaning of this particular paragraph.

The licensee, further, must license the Radio Corporation of America, or any of the parent companies, under any patents he may have or obtain, in any field, during the term of the agreement, at a reasonable price. And if one can not be agreed upon, the value is to be fixed by the New York statute of arbitration.

THE FAMOUS "TUBE" CLAUSE

Another clause requires the licensee to purchase sufficient tubes from the Radio Corporation of America initially to actuate all the sets made by the licensee. In defending this clause, Mr. Sarnoff points out the importance of tubes in the operation of sets and adds that "the tube is the neck of the bottle in the modern radio set."

Mr. Sarnoff's metaphor is a particularly happy one: No bottle can rise higher than its neck. Under this clause in the license agreement, the Radio Corporation of America will control the type and efficiency of the sets manufactured by the licensee. Under this clause the development and engineering of the sets of the licensee will be dictated by the Radio Corporation of America. Furthermore, although Mr. Sarnoff concedes, undoubtedly by advice of counsel, the right to other manufacturers "not infringing patents" to compete for the replacement market, it needs no argument to anyone acquainted with the radio trade to prove that this clause is intended to assure to the Radio Corporation a complete monopoly of the tube business.

Mr. Sarnoff may claim that this is fostering "legitimate competition," and it is probably true that this fostering has been carefully guided by his legal department because it is obviously designed to give the Radio Corporation control of its competitors and to keep them in subservience. How many radio manufacturers in the past three years could have met an additional 7½ per cent cash outlay at the end of each radio season? How many could have paid the $100,000 a year minimum? Each year the ranks would have decreased. All the commercial uncertainties of the past are still with us, and now the licensees have the additional one of making the public pay the increased price necessitated by these royalties. No one knows better than Mr. Sarnoff the financial vicissitudes of the manufacturer of radio sets. He must therefore know of the power which the Radio Corporation of America will gain over the radio industry by its position as a creditor under these license agreements with its competitors.

RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA METHODS OF "FOSTERING COMPETITION"

In other words, how can the Radio Corporation of America claim that it is fostering competition by placing its competitors in a frame of mind where they must be ever conscious that they have to meet a fixed cash liability of 7½ per cent of their billings with $100,000 as the annual minimum; that their engineering must be built around the Radio Corporation of America tube characteristics and their production around Radio Corporation of America tube deliveries; that if they desire to consider their business as a realizable or negotiable asset they must keep themselves in good standing with the Radio Corporation of America?

And at all times every signatory of one of these licensing agreements must have before him the possibility that a new invention may destroy the commercial value of the tuned radio-frequency circuit, but the $100,000 a year minimum would remain in force. Even the Radio Corporation of America might embarrass its licensees by such an invention or it might put the invention on the shelf and keep the royalty income as another evidence of the power which a monopoly has to throttle the development of an industry.

So we have the picture of three of America's greatest corporations in the electrical field pooling their patents to build a radio monopoly. That is the Goliath which the independent manufacturers are called upon to meet. It has licensed such as it chooses among its competitors, and if it can carry out its program it will condemn to death by far the largest majority numerically of the manufacturers of receiving sets, as well as 75 per cent of the manufacturers of tubes, accessories, and parts. And the few it permits to remain will be compelled to live in the same subservience which it now imposes by its license agreements upon those of its competitors who pay their royalties into its treasury. If the Radio Corporation is allowed to carry out these plans, the independent dealer will be forced to go the same way as the independent manufacturer, for it is the history of monopoly that the destruction of competition makes the few dealers that remain mere hired salesmen of the trust.

HIGHER PRICES FOR SETS

So far as the listening public is concerned, the consummation of this monopoly will mean higher prices for sets. Under the battle cry of "stabilization" there will be stagnation in the development of the radio industry; under the pretense of the patent laws there will be a stifled art; in defiance of the antitrust laws there will be the destruction of competition.

The future of radio is still untouched. Before us there opens a broad vista of partially explored fields of radio science—television, wireless telephony, telephotography, broadcasting of power, the breaking down and building up of the electrons in food, the transmission of the life-giving ultra-violet rays, and the many ramifications that lead from these. Yet in all of these there is to be no commercial basis for independent or competitive development!

PURPOSES OF THE RADIO PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION

It was to meet this crisis in the radio industry that the Radio Protective Association has been formed by the outstanding representatives among the independent manufacturers to secure the protection of the laws for this great and growing industry; to mobilize public opinion in behalf of a free art; to appeal to Congress and the other Federal authorities at Washington, as well as to the courts, against the menace which threatens them. The Federal Trade Commission is already investigating the Radio Corporation of America. Resolutions are pending in the Senate to investigate the great aggregations of capital in holding companies in the electrical industry, and it will not be difficult to broaden these to cover the power which such an aggregation of capital could obtain, through monopoly of the radio industry, over the welfare, the happiness, and even the politics of the American people.

Mr. BLEASE. I have a chart, which I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate to read, nor am I going to try to read it, but I am going to hand it to the Senator from Washington, who has taken so much interest in this matter, and let him see, State by State and city by city, just exactly what discriminations have been made under the present law, and what some sections of this country have suffered under the present law.

The Senator from Connecticut a while ago asked the Senator from New Mexico if he was in favor of commission form of government. I am not, but I do not blame the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber for being in favor of it, because it is a particular form of government that belongs to the Republican Party.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not the Senator believe that there were just as many commissions formed in Washington under the eight years of the last Democratic administration as under the last eight years of Republican administration?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I guess I have but one way to answer that. First, thank God, I am not responsible for that administration. I was not a part of it, and did not have anything to do with it. Another thing, I do not think it was entirely in the hands of the Democratic Party, by any means.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will at least admit that those of us who still believe in the principles laid down by Thomas Jefferson, on whichever side of the aisle we happen to sit, do not believe in the commission form of government, and have a right not to believe in it.

Mr. BLEASE. Not only a right, but it is a God-given privilege which we all ought to exercise on both sides of the aisle.

I have never believed in the commission form of government for cities. There are two, I believe, in South Carolina, and neither one of them is ever at peace. That form of government was adopted for those cities under an administration that you might call a part of the administration of the eight years to which the Senator referred, with which, I repeat, I had nothing to do, and I was not responsible for any action it took.

I am opposed to a commission form of government, and I am not delivering a lecture to the Senate, nor would I be so presumptuous as to attempt to do so, but I do think, and have thought for many years, that the American Congress has been derelict in its duty, I do not care under what President it was.

The Constitution of this country puts upon us certain powers and certain duties, and I do not think it is right for this Congress or any other Congress to delegate the lawmaking power to anybody. I do not think it is right for them to allow commissions to make rates for railroads. I do not think it is right for them to have commissions to do anything that can be considered the making of laws, rules, or regulations under which people can be tried in court and put in jail. That is distinctly the right of the American Congress. That is the right, that is the power which the makers of the Constitution intended to vest only in Congress; and if it had not been so there would not have been an executive, a judicial, and a legislative department of the Government.

I think that men should be men and vote for what they believe to be for the best interests of the people they represent and should never delegate to any man or any set of men, be they Republicans or Democrats, the power to make any rule or any law, but they should be simply to execute or carry out the laws made by the people in the House and the Senate. That is one thing that is causing us so much trouble to-day. There is another bill now pending in Congress, and I am opposed to that bill for these reasons: I am opposed to any bill—radio bill or other—in which the Congress delegates its right to make laws to a commission or to an individual.

I do not believe in judge-made law, of which we have so much in this country to-day. Legislatures pass laws and judges construe them to suit themselves. At last it is the judge making the law instead of the lawmaking body.

In other instances we have had executives who have taken it upon themselves to construe what the law is, and to carry it out according to their idea. I think we have a strong example of that now, when the President of the United States has this country at war with another country. Instead of taking out of that country the troops that are in it, he is maintaining them there, directly in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

How can we, who sometimes say so much about law, the crime wave, murders, robberies, and the other many crimes that are being committed in this country—how can we and the others who are the representatives of the people in the three different branches of this Government expect the poor man, the ignorant man, the untrained and the unlettered man, to obey the laws when he looks up and sees his President, the President's Cabinet, judges, Representatives, and Senators openly violating the law?

Mr. President, I repeat that I have had a good deal of pleasure out of this controversy this afternoon. I am glad these gentlemen have come over to my way of thinking, and realize at last that they presented a very unsatisfactory measure then. I hope that before we get through with this report they will realize another failure and go back and make it right, and save the confusion and trouble that we are likely to have for another year if something is not done now.

Now is the accepted time to give the people their rights in the radio service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. BLEASE. I want a full vote on this matter. I would not mind having a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. CURTIS. Quite a number of Senators are absent and we want to have an executive session. I doubt if we could get a quorum now. I would suggest that we have an executive session and then take a recess until to-morrow.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not think we ought to vote on the conference report with so few Senators in the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON. The suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is entirely agreeable.

Mr. CURTIS. Will not the Senator from South Carolina withdraw his demand for a quorum call?

Mr. BLEASE. I withdraw it, with the understanding suggested by the Senator from Kansas.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow noon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, March 23, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

UNIFICATION OF RULES RELATING TO BILLS OF LADING FOR CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA

In executive session this day, on motion of Mr. BORAH and by unanimous consent, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the following convention and protocol of signature thereto:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a certified copy of a convention for the unification of certain rules relating to bills of lading for the carriage of goods by sea and a protocol of signature thereto, which were signed on behalf of the United States by the American ambassador at Brussels on June 23, 1925.

The convention was also signed by representatives of Belgium, Great Britain (with reservations), France, Rumania, Poland and the Free City of Danzig, Germany, Spain, Japan (with reservations), and Italy on various dates between September 8, 1924, and September 17, 1925, and by representatives of Hungary, Estonia, and the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes during the International Conference on Maritime Law held at Brussels April 6–10, 1926. The protocol of signature was signed on behalf of all these countries except Japan.

There is also inclosed a copy of the procès-verbal of signature, giving the names of the signatories and the respective dates of signature, to which are annexed the reservations made by the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain and Japan at the time of signing.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the accompanying report by the Acting Secretary of State concerning the purposes of this convention and certain facts relating to its origin and history.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Acting Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President with a view to their transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a certified copy of a convention for the unification of certain rules relating to bills of lading for the carriage of goods by sea and a protocol of signature thereto, which were signed on behalf of the United States by the American Ambassador at Brussels on June 23, 1925.

The convention was also signed by representatives of Belgium, Great Britain (with reservations), France, Rumania, Poland and the Free City of Danzig, Germany, Spain, Japan (with reservations), and Italy on various dates between September 8, 1924 and September 17, 1925, and by representatives of Hungary, Estonia, and the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes during the International Conference on Maritime Law held at Brussels, April 6–10, 1926. The Protocol of Signature was signed on behalf of all these countries except Japan.

There is also inclosed a copy of the procès-verbal of signature, giving the names of the signatories and the respective dates of signature, to which are annexed the reservations made by the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain and Japan at the time of signing.

The responsibilities and liabilities of carriers of goods by sea for loss or damage to cargoes, their duties and rights, and the responsibilities and rights of shippers as at present governed by the laws of the several countries differ greatly. The purpose of the rules incorporated in this convention, which have been in preparation for a number of years, is to establish international uniformity in these matters on a basis fair to ocean carriers, cargo owners, insurers, and bankers.

The convention substantially in its present form was drafted at the fifth session of the International Conference on Maritime Law, held at Brussels, October 17–26, 1922, at which 24 countries, including the United States, were represented by officially designated delegates. In the report which the delegates of the United States made of the proceedings of the conference, they strongly recommended the adoption of the rules contained in the convention. The 1922 draft was subsequently amended in a few minor particulars not affecting the general principles of the rules, at a meeting of the subcommittee of the conference held at Brussels in October, 1923, at which the United States was represented.

The convention in its final form and the protocol of signature thereto were opened at the Belgian foreign office on August 25, 1924, to remain open for signature for one year, or until August 25, 1925.

In anticipation of, or independently of, the signing of the convention, several bills in which the rules were incorporated were introduced in the House of Representatives in the Sixty-seventh and Sixty-eighth Congresses, with a view to the adoption of the rules by legislative action in the United States, as has been done in Great Britain. The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the Sixty-eighth Congress held final hearings on January 28 and 29, 1925, at which the views of various interests in the United States were developed. While there was practically unanimous approval of the general principles of the rules and of the adoption of most of the provisions of them by the United States, certain amendments in detail were proposed. On February 27, 1925, the committee made a favorable report to the House on a bill in which certain of the amendments proposed were embodied. As the report of the committee was made only a few days before the adjournment of Congress, no further action was taken by Congress.

In view of the approval of the general principles of the rules which had been given by the interests affected and the importance of encouraging the movement for uniformity, as well as the strong indorsement of the rules given by the delegates of the United States to the international conference, the convention and protocol of signature were signed on behalf of the United States by the American ambassador at Brussels on June 23, 1925, within the year in which they were open for signature.

Certain of the interests which had requested modifications in the bill before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries have filed with this department objections to a number of the provisions of the rules with a view to having the United States either refrain from ratifying the convention or make reservations in connection with its ratification.

After obtaining the advice of Hon. Charles M. Hough, judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, New York City, who was one of the delegates of the United States at the international conference held at Brussels in October, 1922, in regard to the objections made to the technical provisions of the rules, I have concluded that these objections would not warrant me in refraining from submitting the convention and protocol of signature to you in the usual way for transmission to the Senate.

It is, however, appropriate that I should mention that among the objections made to the department is one that contractual relations between individuals such as those which are created by bills of lading—in these proposed rules between the shipper and the ocean carrier—should be regulated in the United States by legislation in which both houses of Congress participate and not by treaty. On this point I may say that, in my opinion, the matter may legally be dealt with by treaty, which is the most certain and direct method of obtaining international uniformity. Such uniformity would be prevented to the extent to which amendments in details are made by the United States and by other countries which may follow such a precedent.

The rules in the convention cover the period of transit of goods by sea—namely, from the time of loading on the vessel to the time of discharge therefrom. In so far as regards American overseas commerce it is intended that the existing law of the United States (the Harter Act of February 13, 1893, 27 Stat. 445), shall continue to govern liabilities between shippers and carriers before goods are loaded on a vessel and after they are discharged therefrom. That fact can be made clear by an appropriate reservation if this be deemed necessary.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH O. GREW,
Acting Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 24, 1927.

Who, duly authorized therefore have agreed on the following:

ARTICLE 1

In this convention the following words are employed with the meanings set out below:

(a) "Carrier" includes the owner of the vessel or the charterer who enters into a contract of carriage with a shipper.

(b) "Contract of carriage" applies only to contracts of carriage covered by a bill of lading or any similar document of title, in so far as such document relates to the carriage of goods by sea; it also applies to any bill of lading or any similar document as aforesaid issued under or pursuant to a charter party from the moment at which such instrument regulates the relations between a carrier and a holder of the same.

(c) "Goods" includes goods, wares, merchandise, and articles of every kind whatsoever except live animals and cargo which by the contract of carriage is stated as being carried on deck and is so carried.

(d) "Ship" means any vessel used for the carriage of goods by sea.

(e) "Carriage of goods" covers the period from the time when the goods are loaded on to the time they are discharged from the ship.

ARTICLE 2

Subject to the provisions of Article 6 under every contract of carriage of goods by sea the carrier, in relation to the loading, handling, stowage, carriage, custody, care, and discharge of such goods shall be subject to the responsibilities and liabilities, and entitled to the rights and immunities hereinafter set forth.

ARTICLE 3

1. The carrier shall be bound before and at the beginning of the voyage to exercise due diligence to—

(a) Make the ship seaworthy;

(b) Properly man, equip, and supply the ship;

(c) Make the holds, refrigerating and cool chambers, and all other parts of the ship in which goods are carried, fit and safe for their reception, carriage, and preservation.

2. Subject to the provisions of Article 4 the carrier shall properly and carefully load, handle, stow, carry, keep, care for, and discharge the goods carried.

3. After receiving the goods into his charge the carrier or the master or agent of the carrier shall, on demand of the shipper, issue to the shipper a bill of lading showing among other things:

(a) The leading marks necessary for identification of the goods as the same are furnished in writing by the shipper before the loading of such goods starts, provided such marks are stamped or otherwise shown clearly upon the goods if uncovered, or on the cases or coverings in which such goods are contained, in such a manner as should ordinarily remain legible until the end of the voyage;

(b) Either the number of packages or pieces, or the quantity, or weight, as the case may be, as furnished in writing by the shipper;

(c) The apparent order and condition of the goods;

Provided that no carrier, master, or agent of the carrier shall be bound to state or show in the bill of lading any marks, number, quantity, or weight which he has reasonable grounds for suspecting not accurately to represent the goods actually received or which he has had no reasonable means of checking.

4. Such a bill of lading shall be prima facie evidence of the receipt by the carrier of the goods as therein described in accordance with paragraph 3 (a), (b), and (c).

5. The shipper shall be deemed to have guaranteed to the carrier the accuracy at the time of shipment of the marks, number, quantity, and weight, as furnished by him, and the shipper shall indemnify the carrier against all loss, damages, and expenses arising or resulting from inaccuracies in such particulars. The right of the carrier to such indemnity shall in no way limit his responsibility and liability under the contract of carriage to any person other than the shipper.

6. Unless notice of loss or damage and the general nature of such loss or damage be given in writing to the carrier or his agent at the port of discharge before or at the time of the removal of the goods into the custody of the person entitled to delivery thereof under the contract of carriage, such removal shall be prima facie evidence of the delivery by the carrier of the goods as described in the bill of lading.

If the loss or damage is not apparent, the notice must be given within three days of the delivery.

The notice in writing need not be given if the state of the goods has at the time of their receipt been the subject of joint survey or inspection.

In any event the carrier and the ship shall be discharged from all liability in respect of loss or damage unless suit is brought within one year after delivery of the goods or the date when the goods should have been delivered.

In the case of any actual or apprehended loss or damage the carrier and the receiver shall give all reasonable facilities to each other for inspecting and tallying the goods.

7. After the goods are loaded the bill of lading to be issued by the carrier, master, or agent of the carrier to the shipper shall, if the shipper so demands, be a "shipped" bill of lading, provided that if the shipper shall have previously taken up any document of title to such goods, he shall surrender the same as against the issue of the "shipped" bill of lading. At the option of the carrier such document of title may be noted at the port of shipment by the carrier, master, or agent with the name or names of the ship or ships upon which the goods have been shipped and the date or dates of shipment, and when so noted, if it shows the particulars mentioned in paragraph 3 of Article 3, it shall for the purpose of this article be deemed to constitute a "shipped" bill of lading.

8. Any clause, covenant, or agreement in a contract of carriage relieving the carrier or the ship from liability for loss or damage to or in connection with goods arising from negligence, fault, or failure in the duties and obligations provided in this article, or lessening such liability otherwise than as provided in this convention, shall be null and void and of no effect. A benefit of insurance in favor of the carrier or similar clause shall be deemed to be a clause relieving the carrier from liability.

1. Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be liable for loss or damage arising or resulting from unseaworthiness unless caused by want of due diligence on the part of the carrier to make the ship seaworthy and to secure that the ship is properly manned, equipped, and supplied and to make the holds, refrigerating and cool chambers, and all other parts of the ship in which goods are carried fit and safe for their reception, carriage, and preservation in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of article 3. Whenever loss or damage has resulted from unseaworthiness, the burden of proving the exercise of due diligence shall be on the carrier or other person claiming exemption under this article.

2. Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from:

(a) Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship.

(b) Fire, unless caused by the actual fault or privity of the carrier.

(c) Perils, dangers, and accidents of the sea or other navigable waters.

(d) Act of God.

(e) Act of war.

(f) Act of public enemies.

(g) Arrest or restraint of princes, rulers, or people or seizure under legal process.

(h) Quarantine restrictions.

(i) Act or omission of the shipper or owner of the goods, his agent, or representative.

(j) Strikes or lockouts or stoppage or restraint of labor from whatever cause, whether partial or general.

(k) Riots and civil commotions.

(l) Saving or attempting to save life or property at sea.

(m) Wastage in bulk or weight or any other loss or damage arising from inherent defect, quality, or vice of the goods.

(n) Insufficiency of packing.

(o) Insufficiency or inadequacy of marks.

(p) Latent defects not discoverable by due diligence.

(q) Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage.

3. The shipper shall not be responsible for loss or damage sustained by the carrier or the ship arising or resulting from any cause without the act, fault, or neglect of the shipper, his agents, or his servants.

4. Any deviation in saving or attempting to save life or property at sea or any reasonable deviation shall not be deemed to be an infringement or breach of this convention or of the contract of carriage, and the carrier shall not be liable for any loss or damage resulting therefrom.

5. Neither the carrier nor the ship shall in any event be or become liable for any loss or damage to or in connection with goods in an amount exceeding 100 pounds sterling per package or unit or the equivalent of that sum in other currency unless the nature and value of such goods have been declared by the shipper before shipment and inserted in the bill of lading.

This declaration if embodied in the bill of lading shall be prima facie evidence but shall not be binding or conclusive on the carrier.

By agreement between the carrier, master, or agent of the carrier and the shipper another maximum amount than that mentioned in this paragraph may be fixed, provided that such maximum shall not be less than the figure above named.

Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible in any event for loss or damage to, or in connection with, goods if the nature or value thereof has been knowingly misstated by the shipper in the bill of lading.

6. Goods of an inflammable, explosive, or dangerous nature to the shipment whereof the carrier, master, or agent of the carrier has not consented with knowledge of their nature and character may at any time before discharge be landed at any place or destroyed or rendered innocuous by the carrier without compensation, and the shipper of such goods shall be liable for all damages and expenses directly or indirectly arising out of or resulting from such shipment. If any such goods shipped with such knowledge and consent shall become a danger to the ship or cargo, they may in like manner be landed at any place or destroyed or rendered innocuous by the carrier without liability on the part of the carrier except to general average, if any.

ARTICLE 5

A carrier shall be at liberty to surrender in whole or in part all or any of his rights and immunities, or to increase any of his responsibilities and liabilities under this convention provided such surrender or increase shall be embodied in the bill of lading issued to the shipper.

The provisions of this convention shall not be applicable to charter parties, but if bills of lading are issued in the case of a ship under a charter-party they shall comply with the terms of this convention. Nothing in these rules shall be held to prevent the insertion in a bill of lading of any lawful provision regarding general average.

ARTICLE 6

Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding articles, a carrier, master, or agent of the carrier and a shipper shall in regard to any particular goods be at liberty to enter into any agreement in any terms as to the responsibility and liability of the carrier for such goods, and as to the rights and immunities of the carrier in respect of such goods, or concerning his obligation as to seaworthiness so far as this stipulation is not contrary to public policy, or concerning the care or diligence of his servants or agents in regard to the loading, handling, stowage, carriage, custody, care, and discharge of the goods carried by sea, provided that in this case no bill of lading has been or shall be issued and that the terms agreed shall be embodied in a receipt which shall be a nonnegotiable document and shall be marked as such.

Any agreement so entered into shall have full legal effect:

Provided that this article shall not apply to ordinary commercial shipments made in the ordinary course of trade, but only to other shipments where the character or condition of the property to be carried or the circumstances, terms, and conditions under which the carriage is to be performed are such as reasonably to justify a special agreement.

ARTICLE 7

Nothing herein contained shall prevent a carrier or a shipper from entering into any agreement, stipulation, condition, reservation, or exemption as to the responsibility and liability of the carrier or the ship for the loss or damage to, or in connection with, the custody and care and handling of goods prior to the loading on, and subsequent to the discharge from, the ship on which the goods are carried by sea.

ARTICLE 8

The provisions of this convention shall not affect the rights and obligations of the carrier under any statute for the time being in force relating to the limitation of the liability of owners of seagoing vessels.

ARTICLE 9

The monetary units mentioned in this convention are to be taken to be gold value.

Those contracting states in which the pound sterling is not a monetary unit reserve to themselves the right of translating the sums indicated in this convention in terms of pound sterling into terms of their own monetary system in round figures.

The national laws may reserve to the debtor the right of discharging his debt in national currency according to the rate of exchange prevailing on the day of the arrival of the ship at the port of discharge of the goods concerned.

ARTICLE 10

The provisions of this convention shall apply to all bills of lading issued in any of the contracting States.

ARTICLE 11

After an interval of not more than two years from the day on which the convention is signed, the Belgian Government shall place itself in communication with the governments of the high contracting parties which have declared themselves prepared to ratify the convention, with a view to deciding whether it shall be put into force. The ratifications shall be deposited at Brussels at a date to be fixed by agreement among the said governments. The first deposit of ratifications shall be recorded in a procès-verbal signed by the representatives of the powers which take part therein and by the Belgian Minister for Foreign Affairs.

The subsequent deposits of ratifications shall be made by means of a written notification, addressed to the Belgian Government and accompanied by the instrument of ratification.

A duly certified copy of the procès-verbal relating to the first deposit of ratifications, of the notifications referred to in the previous paragraph, and also of the instruments of ratification accompanying them, shall be immediately sent by the Belgian Government through the diplomatic channel to the powers who have signed this convention or who have acceded to it. In the cases contemplated in the preceding paragraph the said Government shall inform them at the same time of the date on which it received the notification.

ARTICLE 12

Nonsignatory States may accede to the present convention whether or not they have been represented at the International Conference at Brussels.

A State which desires to accede shall notify its intention in writing to the Belgian Government, forwarding to it the document of accession, which shall be deposited in the archives of the said Government.

The Belgian Government shall immediately forward to all the States which have signed or acceded to the convention a duly certified copy of the notification and of the act of accession, mentioning the date on which it received the notification.

ARTICLE 13

The high contracting parties may at the time of signature, ratification, or accession declare that their acceptance of the present convention does not include any or all of the self-governing dominions, or of the colonies, overseas possessions, protectorates, or territories under their sovereignty or authority, and they may subsequently accede separately on behalf of any self-governing dominion, colony, overseas possession, protectorate, or territory excluded in their declaration. They may also denounce the convention separately in accordance with its provisions in respect of any self-governing dominion, or any colony, overseas possession, protectorate, or territory under their sovereignty or authority.

ARTICLE 14

The present convention shall take effect, in the case of the States which have taken part in the first deposit of ratifications, one year after the date of the procès-verbal recording such deposit. As respects the States which ratify subsequently or which accede, and also in cases in which the convention is subsequently put into effect in accordance with Article 13, it shall take effect six months after the notifications specified in paragraph 2 of Article 11, and paragraph 2 of Article 12, have been received by the Belgian Government.

ARTICLE 15

In the event of one of the contracting States wishing to denounce the present convention, the denunciation shall be notified in writing to the Belgian Government, which shall immediately communicate a duly certified copy of the notification to all the other States informing them of the date on which it was received.

The denunciation shall only operate in respect of the State which made the notification, and on the expiry of one year after the notification has reached the Belgian Government.

ARTICLE 16

Any one of the contracting States shall have the right to call for a fresh conference with a view to considering possible amendments.

A State which would exercise this right should notify its intention to the other States through the Belgian Government, which would make arrangements for convening the conference.

REVISION OF INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONVENTION OF JANUARY 17, 1912

In executive session this day, the Senate having had under consideration Executive D, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, an international convention signed at Paris on June 21, 1926, revising the international sanitary convention of January 17, 1912, advised and consented to its ratification, subject to the following understandings and conditions:

1. The ratification of this international sanitary convention is not to be construed to mean that the United States of America recognizes a régime or entity acting as government of a signatory or adhering power when that régime or entity is not recognized by the United States as the government of that power.

2. The participation of the United States of America in this international sanitary convention does not involve any contractual obligation on the part of the United States to a signatory or adhering power represented by a régime or entity which the United States does not recognize as representing the government of that power until it is represented by a government recognized by the United States.

3. The Government of the United States reserves to itself the right to decide whether from the standpoint of the measures to be applied a foreign district is to be considered as infected and to decide what measures shall be applied to arrival in its own ports under special circumstances.

On motion of Mr. BORAH, and by unanimous consent, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the convention, which is as follows:

To the Senate:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith an international convention signed at Paris on June 21, 1926, revising the International Sanitary Convention of January 17, 1912.

King, also of that service, who signed subject to two declarations entered in the protocol of signature, an authenticated copy of which is also furnished for transmission to the Senate. These declarations are as follows:

"The plenipotentiaries of the United States of America formally declare that their signing the International Sanitary Convention of this date is not to be construed to mean that the United States of American recognizes a régime or entity acting as Government of a signatory or adhering power when that régime or entity is not recognized by the United States as the Government of that power. They further declare that the participation of the United States of America in the International Sanitary Convention of this date does not involve any contractual obligation on the part of the United States to a signatory or adhering power represented by a régime or entity with the United States does not recognize as representing the government of that power until it is represented by a government recognized by the United States.

"The plenipotentiaries of the United States of America declare, furthermore, that their Government reserves to itself the right to decide whether from the standpoint of the measures to be applied a foreign district is to be considered as infected and to decide what measures shall be applied to arrival in its own ports under special circumstances."

PRELIMINARY PROVISIONS

For the purposes of this Convention, the high contracting parties adopt the following definitions:

1. The word circonscription designates a fully defined part of territory, for example: a province, a government, a district, a department, a canton, an island, a commune, a city, a city district, a village, a port, a community, et cetera, regardless of the area and population of those parts of territory.

2. The word observation means isolation of the persons either on board a ship or in a sanitary station before they are given free pratique.

The word surveillance means that the persons are not isolated, are immediately given free pratique, but are reported to the health authorities in the several places they are to visit and subjected to a medical examination by which their health condition is ascertained.

3. The word équipage includes all persons who are not on board for the mere purpose of being carried from one country to another, but who are employed in any capacity whatsoever in the service of the ship or persons on board, or of the cargo.

4. The word jour means an interval of twenty-four hours.

TITLE I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

CHAPTER I. PROVISIONS TO BE OBSERVED BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE COUNTRIES PARTICIPATING IN THE PRESENT CONVENTION ON THE APPEARANCE OF PLAGUE, CHOLERA, YELLOW FEVER, OR CERTAIN OTHER INFECTIOUS DISEASES IN THEIR TERRITORY

SECTION I.—Notification and subsequent communications to other countries

ARTICLE 1

Each Government shall immediately notify the other Governments and, at the same time the International Office of Public Hygiene;

(1) The first authentic case of plague, cholera, or yellow fever discovered in its territory;

(2) The first authentic case of plague, cholera, or yellow fever which occurs outside the limits of local areas already affected;

(3) The existence of an epidemic of typhus or of smallpox.

ARTICLE 2

Every notification prescribed in Article I shall be accompanied, or very promptly followed, by detailed information as to—

(1) Where the disease has appeared;

(2) The date of its appearance, its source and its type;

(3) The number of established cases and the number of deaths;

(4) The extent of the area or areas affected;

(5) In the case of plague, the existence of that disease or of an unusual mortality among rats;

(6) In the case of cholera, the number of germ carriers when these have been discovered;

(7) In the case of yellow fever, the presence and relative prevalence (index) of stegomyia calopus (aedes Egypti);

(8) The measures taken.

ARTICLE 3

The notifications contemplated in Articles I and II are to be addressed to the Diplomatic Missions or failing them to consular offices in the capital of the infected country and shall be held at the disposition of consular officers established in its territory.

These notifications shall also be addressed to the International Office of Public Hygiene which shall communicate them immediately to all diplomatic missions, or failing them, to the Consulates, in Paris, as well as to the principal public health authorities of the participating countries. Those prescribed under Article I shall be addressed by telegram.

The telegrams addressed by the International Office of Public Hygiene to the Governments of countries participating in the present Convention or to the principal public health authorities of these countries, and the telegrams transmitted by these Governments and by these authorities under this Convention, are treated like State telegrams and enjoy the priority accorded to such telegrams by Article V of the International Telegraphic Convention of July 10/22, 1875.

ARTICLE 4

The notification and the information contemplated in Articles 1 and 2 shall be followed by subsequent communications sent regularly to the International Office of Public Hygiene so as to keep the Governments informed of the progress of the epidemic.

These communications, which shall be as frequent and as complete as possible and shall take place at least once a week with regard to the number of cases and deaths, shall indicate in particular the precautions adopted with a view to preventing the spread of the disease. They shall specify the measures enforced upon the departure of vessels to prevent exportation of the disease, and especially the measures taken with regard to rats or insects.

ARTICLE 5

The Governments undertake to reply to any request for information which is made to them by the International Office of Public Hygiene in regard to epidemic diseases mentioned in the Convention, which occur in their territory, and in regard to circumstances likely to affect the transmission of these diseases from one country to another.

ARTICLE 6

Since rats[1] are the principal agents by which bubonic plague is spread, the Governments undertake to make use of all means in their power to diminish this danger and constantly to keep themselves informed of the condition of the rats in their ports as regards plague infection, by frequent and periodical examinations; and in particular to carry out the systematic collection and the bacteriological examination of rats in every plague-infected area, during a period of not less than six months from the finding of the last plague-infected rat.

The methods and the results of these examinations shall be communicated in ordinary circumstances at regular intervals, and in the case of plague every month, to the International Office of Public Hygiene in order that Governments may be kept uninterruptedly informed by that Office of the condition of ports in regard to plague amongst rats.

On the first discovery of plague among rats on land, in a port free from infection during the previous six months, the communications shall be sent by the most rapid ways.

ARTICLE 7

In order to facilitate the fulfilment of duties put upon it by this Convention, and having regard to the benefits derived from the information furnished by the epidemiological intelligence service of the League of Nations, including its Eastern Bureau at Singapore, and of other analogous bureaus, as well as by the Pan-American Sanitary Bureau, the International Office of Public Hygiene is empowered to make the needful arrangements with the Health Committee of the League of Nations, as well as with the Pan-American Sanitary Bureau and other similar organizations.

It stands understood that the relations established under the arrangements above indicated will not involve any derogation from the provisions of the Convention of Rome of December 9, 1907, and cannot work the effect of substituting any other sanitary body for the International Office of Public Hygiene.

ARTICLE 8

As it is of primary importance that the foregoing provisions be promptly and scrupulously complied with, the Governments recognize the necessity of giving instructions to the appropriate services in regard to the application of these provisions.

As notification is of no value unless every Government be itself informed, in good time, of cases of plague, cholera, yellow fever, typhus, or smallpox, and also of suspected cases of these diseases which occur in its territory, countries participating in the Convention undertake to make it compulsory to declare such cases.

ARTICLE 9

It is recommended that neighboring countries should make special arrangements, with the object of organizing direct exchange of information between the head of the department concerned as regards territories that are contiguous or have close commercial relations. These arrangements shall be communicated to the International Office of Public Hygiene.

SECTION II. Conditions which warrant considering that the measures prescribed by the convention are or have ceased to be applicable to arrivals from particular areas

ARTICLE 10

The notification of imported cases of plague, cholera or yellow fever shall not lead to the adoption of the measures prescribed in the following Chapter II in regard to arrivals from the area in which they occurred.

But the measures may be adopted when a first case of plague or yellow fever has occurred which is recognized as a non-important case, or when the cases of cholera from a foyer,[2] or when exanthematous typhus or smallpox exists in epidemic form.

ARTICLE 11

In order that the measures prescribed in Chapter II may be limited to places which are actually stricken, Governments must restrict their application to arrivals from defined local areas in which the diseases coming under the present Convention have appeared under the conditions indicated in the second paragraph of Article 10.

But this limitation of an infected local area must be accepted only on the express condition that the Government of the country in which this area is comprised shall take the measures necessary (1) for checking the spread of the epidemic and (2) for applying the measures prescribed by Article 13 below.

[1] The provisions of this Convention regarding rats are applicable to the case of other rodents, and in general to other animals known to be the means of spreading plague.

[2] A "foyer" exists when the occurrence of new cases outside the immediate surroundings of the first cases proves that the spread of the disease has not been limited to the place where it began.

ARTICLE 12

The Government of a country in which an infected area is situated will inform other Governments and the International Office of Public Hygiene in the manner specified in Article 3, when the danger of infection from that area has ceased, and when all the preventive measures have been taken. From the time of this information the measures prescribed in Chapter II will no longer be applicable to arrivals from the area in question, except in exceptional circumstances, which must be established.

SECTION III. Measures at the ports and on the departure of vessels

ARTICLE 13

The competent authority shall be obliged to take effectual measures—

(1) To prevent the embarkation of persons showing symptoms of plague, cholera, yellow fever, exanthematous typhus or smallpox, and of persons in such relations with the sick as to render them liable to transmit the infection of these diseases;

(2) In the case of plague, to prevent rats gaining access to ships;

(3) In the case of cholera, to see that the drinking water and foodstuffs taken on board is wholesome, and that water taken in as ballast is disinfected if necessary;

(4) In the case of yellow fever, to prevent mosquitoes gaining access to ships;

(5) In the case of exanthematous typhus, to secure the delousing of all suspects before their embarkation;

(6) In the case of smallpox, to subject to disinfection worn garments and rags before they are compressed.

ARTICLE 14

Governments undertake to maintain in and around their large ports and, as far as possible, in and around their other ports, a sanitary service possessing an organization and equipment capable of carrying out the application of the prophylactic measures in the case of the diseases coming under this Convention and especially the measures laid down in Articles 6, 8 and 13.

The said Governments will supply at least once a year to the International Office of Public Hygiene a statement showing in the case of each of their ports the condition of its sanitary organization commensurate with the provisions of the preceding paragraph. The Office will forward such information through the proper channels to the principal health authorities of the participating countries either directly or through some other international sanitary organization in accordance with the arrangements concluded under Article 7.

CHAPTER II. MEASURES OF DEFENCE AGAINST THE DISEASES MENTIONED IN CHAPTER I

ARTICLE 15

Any ship, whatever port it comes from, may be subjected by the sanitary authority to a medical inspection, and if circumstances require it, to a thorough examination.

The sanitary measures and actions to which a ship may be subjected on arrival shall be determined by the actual condition found to exist on board and the sanitary particulars of the voyage.

It rests with each Government, taking into account the information furnished under the provisions of Section I, Chapter I, and of Article 14 of this Convention, as well as the obligations placed upon it by Section II, Chapter I, to determine what procedure is applicable in its own ports to arrivals from any foreign port, and in particular to decide whether, from the point of view of the procedure to be applied, a particular foreign port should be considered as infected.

The measures as provided in this Chapter must be regarded as constituting a maximum within the limits of which Governments may regulate the procedure to be applied to ships on their arrival.

SECTION I.—Notification of measures prescribed

Every Government is bound to communicate immediately to the Diplomatic Mission or, failing that, to the Consul of the infected country, residing in its capital, as well as to the International Office of Public Hygiene which shall immediately make them known to the other Governments, the measures which it considers necessary to prescribe with regard to arrivals from that country. Such information will in like manner be held at the disposition of other diplomatic or consular representatives established in its territory.

It also is bound to communicate, through the same channels, the withdrawal of these measures or any modifications thereof.

In the absence of a Diplomatic Mission or a Consulate in the capital, the communications shall be made direct to the Government of the country concerned.

SECTION II.—Merchandise and baggage—Importation and transit

ARTICLE 17

Subject to the provisions of the last paragraph of Article 50, the entry of merchandise and baggage arriving by land or by sea for import or for transit may not be prohibited nor may merchandise or baggage be detained at land frontiers or in ports. The only measures which may be prescribed with regard to such merchandise and baggage are specified in the following paragraphs:

(a) In the case of plague, body linen, wearing apparel and bedding which have been in recent use may be subjected to disinsectisation, and, if necessary, to disinfection.

Merchandise coming from an infected local area and likely to harbor plague-infected rats may be unloaded only on condition that the precautions necessary to prevent the escape of rats and to ensure their destruction are taken as far as practicable.

(b) In the case of cholera, body linen, wearing apparel and bedding which have been in recent use may be subjected to disinfection.

In derogation of the provisions of this Article, the importation of fresh fish, shellfish and vegetables may be prohibited unless they have undergone a treatment calculated to destroy cholera vibrios.

(c) In the case of exanthematous typhus, body linen, wearing apparel and bedding which have been in recent use, as well as rags not carried as merchandise in large quantities, may be subjected to disinsectisation.

(d) In the case of smallpox, body linen, wearing apparel and bedding which have been in recent use, as well as rags not carried as merchandise in large quantities, may be subjected to disinfection.

ARTICLE 18

It rests with the authority of the country to which the merchandise and things are consigned to decide in what manner and at what place disinfection shall be carried out and what shall be the methods adopted to secure the destruction of rats or insects (fleas, lice, mosquitos, et cetera). These operations must be performed in such a fashion as to injure articles as little as possible. Clothes and other articles of small value, including rags not carried in merchandise in large quantities, may be destroyed by fire.

It rests with each State to settle questions of compensation for damage caused by disinfection, deratisation or disinsectisation, or by the destruction of the things referred to above.

If, on account of these measures, charges are levied by the sanitary authority, either directly or indirectly through a company or an individual, the rates of these charges must be in accordance with a tariff made public beforehand and so drawn up that the State and the sanitary authority shall, on the whole, derive no profit from its application.

ARTICLE 19

Letters and correspondence, printed matter, books, newspapers, business documents, et cetera, shall not be subject to any sanitary measure. Post parcels shall be subjected to restriction only if their contents include articles on which the measures provided by Article 17 of the present Convention may be enforced.

ARTICLE 20

When merchandise or baggage has been subjected to the operations prescribed in Article 17, any interested party can require the sanitary authorities to issue a free certificate showing the measures that have been taken.

SECTION III.—Provisions relating to emigrants.

ARTICLE 21

The sanitary authorities in a country of emigration must subject its emigrants to a medical examination before their departure.

It is recommended that special arrangements be made between the countries of emigration, immigration and transit, with a view to laying down the conditions under which this examination shall be considered satisfactory by them, so that rejections on medical grounds at the frontier of the countries of transit and destination may be reduced to a minimum.

It is also recommended that these arrangements should determine what preventive measures against infectious diseases shall be applied to emigrants in the country of departure.

ARTICLE 22

It is recommended that, at the towns or ports of embarkation for emigrants, there should be an adequate health and sanitary administration having especially (1) a service for medical examination and treatment, as well as the necessary medical and prophylactic equipment; (2) an establishment supervised by the State where emigrants may be subjected to the health formalities, temporarily housed, and undergo all necessary medical examinations and have their food and drinking supplies examined; (3) premises situated at the port where medical examinations shall be made at the time of the final embarkation.

ARTICLE 23

It is recommended that emigrant ships be provided with a sufficient quantity of vaccines (anti-smallpox, anti-cholera, et cetera), in order to permit, if necessary, of vaccinations during the voyage.

SECTION IV.—Measures at ports and marine frontiers.

A. PLAGUE

ARTICLE 24

A ship shall be regarded as infected:

(1) if it has a case of human plague on board;

(2) or if a case of human plague broke out more than six days after embarkation;

(3) or if plague-infected rats are found on board.

A ship shall be regarded as suspected:

(1) if a case of human plague broke out in the first six days after embarkation;

(2) or if investigations regarding rats have shown the existence of an unusual mortality without determining the cause thereof.

The ship shall continue to be regarded as suspicious until it has been subjected to the measures prescribed by this Convention at a suitably equipped port.

A ship shall be regarded as uninfected, notwithstanding its having come from an infected port if there has been no human or rat plague on board either at the time of departure, or during the voyage, or at the time of arrival, and the investigations regarding rats have not shown the existence of an unusual mortality.

ARTICLE 25

Plague-infected ships shall undergo the following measures:

(1) Medical inspection;

(2) The patients shall immediately be landed and isolated;

(3) All persons who have been in contact with the patients and those whom the health authority of the port has reason to consider suspect shall be disembarked if possible. They may be subjected to observation or surveillance, or to a period of observation followed by surveillance,[3] provided that the total duration of these measures does not exceed six days from the time of arrival of the ship.

It rests with the sanitary authority of the port, after taking into consideration the date of the last case, the condition of the ship and the local possibilities, to take that one of these measures which seems to it preferable. During the same period the crew may be prevented from going ashore except on duty made known to the sanitary authority;

(4) Bedding which has been used, and such soiled linen, wearing apparel and other articles as are, in the opinion of the sanitary authority, infected shall be disinsectised and, if there be occasion, disinfected;

(5) The parts of the ship which have been occupied by persons suffering from plague or which, in the opinion of the sanitary authority, are infected, shall be disinsectised and, if there be occasion, disinfected;

(6) The sanitary authority may order deratisation before the discharge of cargo, if it is of opinion, having regard to the nature of the cargo, and the way in which it is loaded, that it is possible to effect a total destruction of rats without removing it. In this case, the ship can not be subjected to a new deratisation after discharge. In other cases the complete destruction of rats on board must be effected when the holds are empty. In the cases of ships in ballast, this shall be done as soon as possible before taking cargo.

Destruction of rats shall be carried out so as to avoid, as far as possible, damage to the ship and cargo (if any). The operation must not last longer than twenty-four hours. All charges made in respect to these operations of deratisation as also all contingent indemnity claims, shall be settled in accordance with the principles laid down in Article 18.

If a ship is only to discharge a part of its cargo, and if the port authorities consider that it is impossible to undertake complete deratisation, the said ship shall be allowed to remain in the port for the time required to discharge that part of its cargo, provided that all precautions, including isolation, are taken to the satisfaction of the sanitary authority to prevent rats from passing from ship to shore, either with unladen goods or otherwise.

The discharge of cargo shall be carried out under the supervision of the sanitary authority, who shall take all measures necessary to prevent the men employed on this duty from becoming infected. The men shall be subjected to observation or to surveillance for a period not exceeding six days from the time when they have ceased to work at the unloading of the ship.

ARTICLE 26

Plague-suspected ships shall undergo the measures indicated in Nos. 1, 4, 5 and 6 of Article 25.

In addition, the crew and passengers may be subjected to surveillance which shall not exceed six days, reckoned from the date of the ship's arrival. The crew may be prevented during the same period from going ashore except on duty made known to the Sanitary Authority.

ARTICLE 27

Ships uninfected with plague shall be given free pratique immediately, with the reservation that the sanitary authority of the port of arrival may prescribe the following measures with regard to them:

(1) Medical inspection to determine whether the condition of the ship corresponds to the definition of a healthy ship;

(2) Destruction of rats on board under the conditions specified in 6 of Article 25 in exceptional cases and for well-founded reasons which will be communicated in writing to the Captain of the ship;

(3) The crew and passengers may be subjected to surveillance during a period which shall not exceed six days reckoned from the date on which the ship left the contaminated port. The crew may be prevented during the same period from going ashore except on duty made known to the sanitary authority.

ARTICLE 28

All ships, except those employed in national coastwise service, must be periodically deratised, or be permanently kept in such a condition that rat population is reduced to the minimum. In the first case they receive Deratisation Certificates, and in the second Deratisation Exemption Certificates.

Governments shall make known through the International Office of Public Hygiene those of their ports possessing the equipment and personnel necessary for the deratisation of ships.

A deratisation certificate or a deratisation exemption certificate shall be issued only by the sanitary authority of the aforesaid ports. The certificate shall be valid for six months. One additional month, however, may be allowed in the case of a ship proceeding to its home port.

If no valid certificate is produced, the sanitary authority at the ports mentioned in the second paragraph of this Article may after inquiry and inspection:

(a) Directly perform the deratisation of the vessel, or cause it to be done under its direction and supervision. When completed to its satisfaction it shall issue a dated Deratisation Certificate. It shall decide in each case what process shall be employed practically to exterminate the rats on board; particulars of the mode of deratising applied and of the number of rats destroyed must be entered on the Certificate. Destruction of rats must be accomplished in a manner that will as far as possible save the ship and cargo (if any) from injury. The operation must not last longer than 24 hours. In the case of vessels in ballast, it must be done before loading. All charges on account of these operations of deratisation and all claims, if any, for damages shall be settled according to the terms of Article 18.

(b) Issue a Deratisation Exemption Certificate stating the date and grounds if it is satisfied that the ship is maintained in such a condition that the rat population is reduced to a minimum.

The deratisation and deratisation exemption certificates shall be drawn up as far as possible in a uniform manner. Forms of such certificates will be prepared by the International Office of Public Hygiene.

The competent authority of each country undertakes each year to furnish the International Office of Public Hygiene with a statement of the measures taken under this article and the number of ships which have been subjected to deratisation, or which have been granted deratisation exemption certificates, at the ports referred to in the second paragraph of this Article.

The International Office of Public Hygiene is requested to take in accordance with Article 14 all steps for the interchange of information as to the action taken under this Article and the results obtained.

[3] In all cases where the present Convention refers to "Surveillance" the sanitary authority may substitute "Observation" as an exceptional measure in the case of persons who do not offer adequate sanitary guarantees.

Persons under observation or surveillance must submit to all clinical or bacteriological investigations which are considered necessary by the sanitary authority.

The provisions of this Article do not affect the rights accorded to sanitary authorities by Articles 24–27 of this Convention.

The Governments shall see that all requisite and practicable measures are taken by the competent authorities to accomplish the destruction of rats in ports and the dependent and neighboring ports as well as on lighters and coastwise vessels.

B. CHOLERA

A ship shall be regarded as infected if there is a case of cholera on board, or if there has been a case of cholera during the five days previous to the arrival of the ship in port.

A ship shall be regarded as suspected if there has been a case of cholera at the time of departure or during the voyage, but no fresh case in the five days previous to arrival. The ship shall continue to be regarded as suspect until it has been subjected to the measures prescribed by the present Convention.

A ship shall be considered uninfected notwithstanding that it came from an infected port or that it may have on board persons proceeding from an infected area if there has been no case of cholera at the time of departure, during the voyage, or on arrival.

Cases presenting the clinical symptoms of cholera in which no cholera vibrios have been found, or in which vibrios not strictly showing the characteristics of cholera vibrio have been found, shall be subject to all measures required in the case of cholera.

Germ carriers discovered on the arrival of the ship shall be submitted after disembarkation to all the obligations which may be imposed on such a case by the laws of the country of arrival on its own nationals.

ARTICLE 30

Cholera-infected ships shall be subjected to the following measures:

(1) Medical inspection;

(2) The patients shall be immediately landed and isolated;

(3) The crew and passengers may also be landed and either be kept under observation or subjected to surveillance during a period not exceeding five days reckoned from the date of arrival.

However, persons who can show that they have been immunized from cholera by vaccination effected less than six months, and more than six days before, may be subjected to surveillance but not to observation.

(4) Bedding which has been used, soiled linen, wearing apparel and other articles, including foodstuffs, which in the opinion of the sanitary authority of the port have been recently contaminated, shall be disinfected;

(5) The parts of the vessel which have been occupied by cholera patients or which are considered by the health authorities as being contaminated, shall be disinfected;

(6) Unloading shall be carried out under the supervision of the sanitary authority, who will take all measures necessary to prevent the infection of the men engaged in unloading. They shall be subjected to observation or to surveillance which shall not exceed five days from the time when they cease unloading;

(7) When the drinking water stored on board is considered suspicious it shall be turned off after being disinfected and replaced after disinfection of the tanks by a supply of water of good quality;

(8) The health authority may prohibit the turning off without previous disinfection of water ballast if it has been taken in at an infected port;

(9) It may be forbidden to let run or throw human dejections or the residuary waters of the vessel into the waters of the port, unless they are first disinfected.

ARTICLE 31

Vessels suspected of cholera shall be subjected to the measures prescribed under Nos. (1), (4), (5), (7), (8), and (9) of Article 30.

The crew and passengers may be subjected to a surveillance not to exceed five days from the arrival of the vessel. It is recommended that the landing of the crew be prevented during the same period except for purposes connected with the service and made known to the sanitary authority of the port.

ARTICLE 32

If the ship has been declared infected or suspected only because of cases on board presenting the clinical features of cholera, and two bacteriological examinations, made with an interval of not less than 24 hours between them, have not revealed the presence of cholera or any other suspicious vibrios, it shall be classed as uninfected.

ARTICLE 33

Vessels uninfected with cholera shall be granted pratique immediately.

The health authority of the port of arrival may order in their case the measures provided under Nos. (1), (7), (8), and (9) of Article 30.

The crew and the passengers may be subjected to a surveillance not to exceed five days from the date of arrival of the ship. The landing of the crew may be forbidden during the same period except for purposes connected with the service and made known to the sanitary authority of the port.

ARTICLE 34

Since anti-cholera vaccination is a method of proved efficacy in checking cholera epidemics, and consequently in lessening the likelihood of the spread of the disease, it is recommended that sanitary administrations will, in the largest measure possible, and as often as practicable, apply specific vaccination in cholera hotbeds and grant certain advantages as regards restrictive measures to persons who agree to be vaccinated.

C. YELLOW FEVER

ARTICLE 35

A ship shall be regarded as infected if there is a case of yellow fever on board, or if there was one at the time of departure or during the voyage.

A ship shall be regarded as suspected if it had no case of yellow fever but arrives after a voyage of less than six days from an infected port or from an uninfected port in close relation with endemic centers of yellow fever, or if when it arrived having been more than six days out there is reason to believe that it may carry winged Stegomyia (Aedes Egypti) from the said port.

A ship shall be regarded as uninfected, notwithstanding its having come from a yellow-fever infected port if, having had no case of yellow fever on board and arrived after more than six days on the way, there is no reason to believe that it carries winged Stegomyia, or when it proves to the satisfaction of the sanitary authority of the port of arrival:

(a) That during its stay in the port of departure it kept at a distance of more than 200 metres from the inhabited land and at such a distance from the pontoons as to make the access of Stegomyia improbable;

(b) Or that at the time of departure it was subjected to effective fumigation in order to destroy mosquitoes.

ARTICLE 36

Ships infected with fellow fever shall undergo the following measures:

(1) Medical inspection;

(2) The patients shall be landed, and those of them who are in the first five days of the disease shall be isolated so as to prevent contamination by mosquitoes;

(3) The other persons who land shall be subjected to observation or surveillance not exceeding six days reckoned from the time of landing;

(4) The ship will be moored at least 200 metres from the inhabitated land and at such a distance from the pontoons as will render the access of Stegomyia improbable;

(5) Mosquitoes at all stages of evolution shall be destroyed on board as far as possible before discharge of cargo. If unloading takes place before the destruction of mosquitoes, the personnel in charge of that work will be subjected to observation or to surveillance for not more than six days from the time when they ceased unloading.

ARTICLE 37

Ships suspected of yellow fever may be subjected to the measures specified in (1), (3), (4), and (5) of Article 36.

Nevertheless, if the voyage has lasted less than six days if the ship meets the conditions specified under letters (a) and (b) in the subsection of Article 35 relating to uninfected ships, it shall only be subjected to the measures prescribed by Article 36, (1) and (3) and to fumigation.

When 30 days have elapsed after the departure of the ship from the infected port, and no case has occurred during its voyage, the ship may be granted free pratique subject to preliminary fumigation should the sanitary authority deem it necessary.

ARTICLE 38

Ships uninfected with yellow fever shall be granted free pratique after medical inspection.

ARTICLE 39

The measures prescribed in Articles 36 and 37 concern only those regions in which the Stegomyia exists, and they shall be applied with due consideration to the climatic conditions prevailing in the countries concerned and also the Stegomyian index.

In other regions they shall be applied to the extent considered necessary by the sanitary authority.

ARTICLE 40

The masters of ships which have touched at ports infected with yellow fever are specially advised to cause a search to be made for mosquitoes and their larvae during the voyage and to secure their systematic destruction in all accessible parts of the ship, particularly in the store rooms, galleys, boiler rooms, water tanks, and other places specially likely to harbor Stegomyia.

D. EXANTHEMATOUS TYPHUS.

ARTICLE 41

Ships which, during the voyage have had or at the time of their arrival, have a case of typhus on board, may be subjected to the following measures:

(1) Medical inspection;

(2) The patients shall immediately be landed, isolated, and deloused;

(3) Other persons reasonably suspected to harbor lice, or to have been exposed to infection, shall also be deloused, and may be subjected to surveillance for a time to be specified, but which shall never be more than 12 days, reckoned from the date of delousing;

(4) Bedding which has been used, and such linen, wearing apparel, and other articles as to the sanitary authority of the port considers to be infected shall be disinsected;

(5) The parts of the ship which have been occupied by persons ill with typhus, and that the sanitary authority regard as infected, shall be disinsected.

The ship shall immediately be given free pratique.

It rests with each Government to take after disembarkation the measures which it considers appropriate to secure the surveillance of persons who arrive on a ship which had no case of exanthematous typhus on board, but who left an area where typhus is epidemic less than 12 days before.

E. SMALLPOX

ARTICLE 42

Ships which have had a case of smallpox on board either during the voyage or at the time of arrival may be subjected to the following measures:

(1) Medical inspection;

(2) The patients shall immediately be landed and isolated;

(3) Other persons reasonably suspected to have been exposed to infection on board, and who, in the opinion of the sanitary authority, are not sufficiently protected by recent vaccination, or by a previous attack of smallpox, may be subjected to vaccination followed by surveillance, the period of surveillance being specified in each case according to the circumstances, but never to exceed 14 days, reckoned from the date of arrival;

(4) Bedding which has been used, soiled linen, wearing apparel, and other articles which the sanitary authority of the port considers to be infected, shall be disinfected;

(5) Only those parts of the ship which have been occupied by persons ill with smallpox and which the sanitary authority regards as infected shall be disinfected.

The ship shall immediately be given free pratique.

It rests with each Government to take after disembarkation the measures which it considers appropriate to secure the surveillance of persons who are not protected by vaccination and arrive on a ship that had no smallpox on board, but left an area where smallpox is epidemic less than 14 days before.

ARTICLE 43

It is recommended that ships calling in countries where smallpox is epidemic shall take all precautions possible to secure the vaccination or revaccination of the crew.

It is also recommended that governments should make vaccination and revaccination as general as possible, especially in ports and border regions.

F. COMMON PROVISIONS

ARTICLE 44

The captain and the ship's physician must answer all questions that are put to them by the sanitary authority with regard to the health of the ship during the voyage.

When the captain and the physician declare that there has not been any case of plague, cholera, yellow fever, exanthematous typhus or smallpox, and no unusual mortality among rats on the ship since the time of its departure, the sanitary authority may require them to make a solemn or sworn declaration.

ARTICLE 45

In applying the measures set forth in the preceding subsections A, B, C, D, and E the sanitary authority will take into account the presence of a physician on board and the actual preventive measures taken in the course of the voyage, especially for the destruction of rats.

The sanitary authorities of countries that find it convenient to come to an agreement on the matter may exempt from medical inspection and other measures uninfected ships carrying a physician specially commissioned by their country.

ARTICLE 46

It is recommended that Governments take into account, as to the treatment to be applied to arrivals from another country, measures taken in the latter country to combat infectious diseases and to prevent their transmission to other countries.

Ships arriving from ports which fulfill the conditions set out in Articles 14 and 51 do not derive from that alone any right to special advantages at the port of arrival, but the Governments agree to take into the fullest consideration the measures already taken in those ports, so that all the measures taken at the port of arrival with regard to ships coming from those ports shall be reduced to a minimum. To that end and in order to put shipping, commerce, and traffic to as little inconvenience as possible it is recommended that special arrangements in accordance with Article 57 of this Convention be made in all cases where it would seem advantageous to do so.

Ships arriving from an infected area which have been submitted to sufficient sanitary measures to the satisfaction of the sanitary authority, shall not undergo those measures again on their arrival at another port, whether or not the latter belongs to the same country, provided nothing has happened since which would call for the application of the sanitary measures above referred to and the ships have not called at an infected port, except for coaling.

A ship shall not be considered as having stopped at a port when without having been in communication with the shore it has landed passengers only and their luggage and the mail, or has taken on board only mails or passengers, with or without their luggage, who have not communicated with the port or with a contaminated area. In the case of yellow fever the vessel must, in addition, have kept wherever possible not less than two hundred metres from inhabited land and at such a distance from the pontoons as to make access of Stegomyia improbable.

The port authority who imposes sanitary measures shall, whenever requested, deliver to the captain, or any other interested person, a certificate specifying the nature of the measures and the methods employed, the parts of the ship treated, and the reasons why the measures have been applied.

It may also in the same way, on demand, issue free of charge to passengers who have arrived by an infected ship a certificate stating the date of their arrival and the measures to which they and their luggage have been subjected.

SECTION V.—General Provisions.

ARTICLE 49

It is recommended—

(1) That bills of health be issued free in all ports;

(2) That fees for consular visas be reduced by way of reciprocity, so as not to represent more than the cost of the service rendered;

(3) That the bill of health be made out in at least one of the languages known to maritime world, in addition to that of the country where it is issued;

(4) That special agreements in the spirit of Article 57 of this Convention be made with a view to doing away gradually with consular visas and bills of health.

ARTICLE 50

It is desirable that the number of ports furnished with an organization and equipment sufficient for the reception of a ship, whatever its health conditions may be, should be in each country commensurate with the importance of the trade and shipping. However, without prejudice to the right of Governments to make agreements for the establishment of common sanitary stations, every country must provide at least one port on each of its seacoasts with the above-mentioned organization and equipment.

Furthermore, it is recommended that all large seaports should be so equipped that uninfected ships at least may undergo immediately upon their arrival the prescribed sanitary measures without being sent to another port for this purpose.

Every infected or suspected ship which arrives in a port not equipped for its reception must proceed, at its own risk and peril, to one of the ports opened to ships of the category to which it belongs.

Governments shall make known to the International Office of Public Hygiene what ports are open to arrivals from ports infected with plague, cholera, or yellow fever, and in particular those open to infected or suspected ships.

ARTICLE 51

It is recommended that there be set up in large seaports:

(a) A regular port medical service, and permanent medical surveillance of the health condition of crews and of the inhabitants of the port;

(b) An outfit for the transport of the sick and suitable premises for their isolation, and for keeping suspected persons under observation;

(c) Installations necessary for efficient disinfection and disinsectisation, bacteriological laboratory, and a force prepared to attend to urgent vaccination against smallpox or against other diseases;

(d) A supply of drinking water of quality beyond suspicion for the use of the port, and a system affording all possible security for the removal of waste, filth, and waste water;

(e) A competent and adequate staff and necessary equipment for the deratisation of ships, yards, docks, and warehouses;

(f) A permanent organization for the detection and examination of rats.

It is also recommended that warehouses and docks should as far as possible be rat proof, and that the sewer system of the port be separate from that of the town.

ARTICLE 52

Governments will refrain from making any sanitary inspection of ships passing through their territorial waters[4] without stopping at the ports or on the coasts of their respective countries.

If the ship, for any reason whatever, should stop at a port or on the coast, it would be subjected to the sanitary laws and regulations of the country to which the port or coast belongs as far as permitted by international conventions.

ARTICLE 53

Special measures may be prescribed regarding any ship in an exceptionally bad sanitary condition likely to facilitate the spread of the diseases mentioned in this Convention, especially crowded ships.

ARTICLE 54

Ships unwilling to comply with obligations imposed by the port authority, in virtue of the provisions of this Convention, shall be at liberty to put out to sea.

Such ships may, however, be permitted to land goods if the ship is isolated and if the goods are subjected to the measures provided by Chapter II, Section II, of this Convention.

Such ships may also be authorized to disembark passengers at their request, on the condition that such passengers submit to the measures prescribed by the sanitary authority.

The ship, while kept isolated, may also take on fuel, stores and water.

ARTICLE 55

Each Government undertakes to have a single sanitary tariff only, which shall be published, and the charges therein shall be moderate. This tariff will be applied in ports to all ships, without distinction being made between the national and foreign flags, and to foreigners in the same conditions as to the country's own nationals.

ARTICLE 56

International coasting traffic will come under special regulations, to be agreed upon by the countries concerned. Nevertheless the provisions of Article 28 of the present Convention shall be applicable to them in all cases.

ARTICLE 57

The Governments, taking into account their peculiar situation, may conclude special agreements amongst themselves, in order to make the sanitary measures prescribed by this Convention more efficacious and less cumbersome. The text of such agreements shall be communicated to the International Office of Public Hygiene.

SECTION VI.—Measures at land frontiers.—Travellers.—Railways—Frontier Zones—River-Ways

ARTICLE 58

Observations shall not be established at land frontiers.

Persons showing symptoms of the diseases mentioned in this Convention alone may be detained at frontiers.

This principle does not deprive a State of the right to close a portion of its frontiers if need be. The places through which border traffic will exclusively be allowed shall be designated, and in such cases duly equipped sanitary stations shall be set up at the places thus designated. Notice of these measures shall immediately be given to the neighboring country concerned.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the present Article, persons having been in contact with a person ill with pulmonary plague may be retained at land frontiers under observation for not more than seven days reckoned from the time of arrival.

Persons who have been in contact with a person ill with exanthematous typhus may be submitted to delousing.

ARTICLE 59

In trains coming from infected areas it is important that the railway crew keep watch on the way over the state of health of the travellers.

Medical intervention shall be limited to inspection of travellers and care of the sick and the latters' companions if there be occasion. When this inspection is resorted to, it shall, as far as possible, be combined with the Custom examination in order that travellers may suffer as little delay as possible.

ARTICLE 60

Railway cars running in countries where yellow fever exists must be so arranged as to be as little suited as possible for the transport of Stegomyia.

ARTICLE 61

Travellers coming from an area which lies under the conditions coming under the second paragraph of Article 10 of this Convention may be subjected on arrival at their destination to surveillance for not more than six days reckoned from the date of their arrival in the case of plague, five days in the case of cholera, six days in the case of yellow fever, twelve days in the case of exanthematous typhus, or fourteen days in the case of smallpox.

ARTICLE 62

With respect to diseases coming under this Convention, Governments, notwithstanding the foregoing provisions, reserve the right in exceptional cases to take special measures in regard to certain classes of persons who do not offer satisfactory sanitary guarantees, especially persons travelling or crossing the frontier in bands. The provisions of this paragraph are not applicable to emigrants save the provisions of Article 21.

These measures may include the establishment at frontiers of sanitary stations, sufficiently equipped, to ensure the surveillance, and the observation if necessary, of the persons concerned, as well as for their medical examination, disinfection, disinsectisation and vaccination.

As far as possible, these exceptional measures should be made the subject of special arrangements between adjoining States.

ARTICLE 63

Railway cars for passengers, mails or luggage and freight cars may not be detained at the frontier.

If, however, one of the carriages is infected or has been occupied by any person suffering from plague, cholera, exanthematous typhus, or smallpox, it shall be detained all the time required to undergo the prophylactic measures indicated for each case.

ARTICLE 64

The measures concerning the crossing of frontiers by railroad and postal employees are within the province of the administrations concerned. They shall be combined so as not to hinder the service.

ARTICLE 65

The regulation of frontier traffic and questions pertaining thereto, shall be left to special arrangements between the contiguous countries in accordance with the provisions of this Convention.

ARTICLE 66

It shall be the province of the Government of the riparian Nations to regulate the sanitary régime of lakes and river routes by means of special arrangements.

TITLE II. SPECIAL PROVISIONS FOR THE SUEZ CANAL AND NEIGHBORING COUNTRIES

SECTION I.—Measures with respect to ordinary vessels hailing from contaminated northern ports and appearing at the entrance of the Suez Canal or in Egyptian ports

ARTICLE 67

ARTICLE 68

Ordinary uninfected vessels wishing to make a landing in Egypt may stop at Alexandria or Port Said.

If the port of departure is contaminated by plague, Article 37 will be applicable.

If the port of departure is contaminated by cholera, Article 33 will be applicable.

The sanitary authority of the port may substitute for surveillance observation either on board or in a quarantine station.

[4] The expression "territorial waters" must be understood in its strictly juridical sense. It does not include Suez, Panama, and Kiel Canals.

ARTICLE 69

The measures to which infected or suspected vessels shall be subjected which hail from a plague or cholera infected port of Europe or the shores of the Mediterranean or the Black Sea, and which desire to effect a landing in one of the Egyptian ports or to pass through the Suez Canal, shall be determined by the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt in conformity with the stipulations of the present Convention.

ARTICLE 70

The regulations of the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt shall be revised with the least possible delay to conform with the stipulations of this Convention. In order to become effective, they must be accepted by the several Powers represented on the Board. They shall establish the régime to which ships, passengers and merchandise are to be subjected. They shall decide the minimum number of medical officers to be attached to each station, the method of recruitment, the salaries, and duties of such medical officers and all officials appointed to carry out under the orders of the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt the supervision and the execution of preventive measures.

The names of the physicians and officials shall be proposed to the Egyptian Government by the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt, through its President.

SECTION II.—Measures in the Red Sea

ARTICLE 73

Suspected ships.—Suspected ships having a physician on board may, if regarded by the sanitary authority as presenting sufficient guarantees, be allowed to pass through the Suez Canal in quarantine under the regulations provided for in Article 70.

When the ship is to stop at an Egyptian port:

(a) In the case of plague, the provisions of Article 6 are applicable, but surveillance may be replaced by observation;

(b) In the case of cholera, the provisions of Article 31 are applicable with the same reservation as to observation instead of surveillance.

ARTICLE 74

Infected ships.—(a) Plague.—The measures laid down in Article 25 are applicable. Where danger of infection exists, the ship may be required to moor at Moses' Wells or any other place named by the sanitary authority of the port.

They shall be subjected to the preventive measures and to the treatment imposed on such vessels.

If they are bound for Egypt they may undergo, in a sanitary establishment designated by the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board, an observation of five days for cholera and six days for the plague from the date of their embarkation. They shall be subjected, moreover, to all the measures prescribed for suspected vessels (disinfection, et cetera), and shall not be granted pratique until they have passed a favorable medical examination.

It shall be understood that if the vessels have had suspicious occurrences during the voyage they shall pass the observation period at Moses Spring, which shall last five days for cholera and six days for the plague.

ARTICLE 76

"Have you any helpers: stokers or other workmen, not inscribed on your crew list or on the special register? What is their nationality? Where did you embark them?"

The sanitary physicians shall ascertain the presence of these helpers and if they discover that any of them are missing they should carefully seek the cause of their absence.

ARTICLE 81

A health officer and at least two guards of the sanitary service shall board the vessel and accompany her to Port Said. Their duty shall be to prevent communications and see to the execution of the prescribed measures during the passage through the canal.

ARTICLE 82

The supply and preparation of food on board vessels shall be effected with the means at hand on the vessels.

Stevedores or any other persons who may have gone on board shall be isolated on the quarantine barge. They shall undergo the regulation measures.

ARTICLE 86

When it is absolutely necessary for vessels passing through in quarantine to take on coal or oil at Suez or Port Said, they shall perform this operation under the necessary guarantee for isolation and sanitary surveillance that may be ordered by the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt. When it is possible to maintain a strict supervision of coaling on board the vessel and to prevent all contact with the persons on board, the coaling of the vessel by the workmen of the port may be permitted. At night the place where the coaling is done should be efficiently illuminated by electric lights.

ARTICLE 87

The pilots, electricians, agents of the Company, and sanitary guards must leave the vessel at Port Said outside of the port between the jetties, and thence conducted directly to the quarantine barge where they shall undergo the measures that may be deemed necessary.

ARTICLE 88

The war vessels hereinafter specified shall enjoy the benefits of the following provisions when passing through the Suez Canal:

They shall be recognized by the quarantine authority as uninfected upon the production of a certificate issued by the physicians on board, countersigned by the commanding officer, and affirming under oath or solemn declaration:

These vessels shall be emptied into the infirmary latrines which shall be thoroughly disinfected after each projection of matter.

ARTICLE 118

Articles of bedding, carpets, and clothing which have been in contact with the patients mentioned in the preceding article shall be immediately disinfected. The observance of this rule is especially recommended with regard to the clothing of persons who come near to these patients and which may have become soiled.

Such of the articles mentioned above as have no value shall be thrown overboard, if the vessel is neither in a port nor a canal, or else destroyed by fire. The others shall be disinfected as directed by the ship physician.

He may only take it on board after the tanks shall have been disinfected.

ARTICLE 122

The physician shall examine the pilgrims, attend the patients, and see that the rules of hygiene are observed on board. He shall especially:

1. Satisfy himself that the provisions dealt out to the pilgrims are of good quality, that their quantity is in conformity with the obligations assumed, and that they are suitably prepared;

2. Satisfy himself that the requirements of article 120 relative to the distribution of water are observed;

3. If there is any doubt about the quality of the drinking water, remind the captain in writing of the provisions of Article 121;

5. Satisfy himself that the lodgings of the pilgrims are maintained in a healthful condition, and that, in case of transmissible disease, they are disinfected in conformity with Article 119;

6. Keep a diary of all the sanitary incidents occurring during the course of the voyage and present on request this diary to the competent authority of the port of call or arrival.

ARTICLE 123

The persons intrusted with the care of patients suffering with the plague, cholera or other diseases shall alone have access to them and shall have no contact with the other persons on board.

ARTICLE 124

In case of a death occurring during the voyage, the captain shall make note of the death opposite the name on the list viséed by the authority of the port of departure, besides entering on his journal the name of the deceased person, his age, where he comes from, the presumable cause of his death according to the physician's certificate, and the date of the death.

In case of death by a transmissible disease, the body shall be wrapped in a shroud saturated with a disinfecting solution and thrown overboard.

In each port of call the captain shall have the list prepared in accordance with Article 113 viséed by the competent authority.

In case a pilgrim is landed during the course of the voyage, the captain shall note the fact on the list opposite the name of the pilgrim.

In case of an embarkation, the persons embarked shall be mentioned on this list in conformity with the aforementioned Article 113 and before it is viséed again by the competent authority.

ARTICLE 126

The bill of health delivered at the port of departure shall not be changed during the course of the voyage. If this requirement is not complied with, the vessel may be treated as an infected vessel.

It shall be viséed by the health authority of each port of call, who shall note thereon:

1. The number of passengers landed or embarked in that port;

2. The incidents occurring at sea and affecting the health or life of the persons on board;

3. The sanitary condition of the port of call.

SECTION IV.—Measures to be taken on the arrival of pilgrims in the Red Sea

A. SANITARY MEASURES APPLICABLE TO PILGRIM SHIPS BOUND FROM THE SOUTH TOWARD HEDJAZ

ARTICLE 127

Pilgrim ships hailing from the south and bound for Hedjaz shall first stop at the sanitary station of Camaran, where they shall be subjected to the measures prescribed in the following articles.

ARTICLE 128

Vessels recognized as uninfected after a medical inspection shall obtain pratique when the following operations are completed:

The pilgrims shall be landed; take a shower or sea bath; and there soiled linen and the part of their wearing apparel and baggage which appears suspicious in the opinion of the health authority shall be disinfected. The duration of these operations, including debarkation and embarkation, shall not exceed forty-eight hours. Provided the time limit be not exceeded, the sanitary authority may perform such bacteriological examinations as may be deemed necessary.

If no real or suspected case of plague or cholera is discovered during these operations, the pilgrims shall be reembarked immediately and the vessel shall proceed toward Jeddah.

Vessels found, on medical inspection, to be uninfected shall not undergo the measures prescribed hereinabove, if the following conditions are fulfilled:

(1) All pilgrims on board have been immunized against cholera and smallpox;

(2) The requirements of this Convention have been strictly followed;

(3) There is no reason to doubt the declaration of the captain and doctor of the ship to the effect that no case of plague, cholera or smallpox has occurred on board, either at the time of departure or during the voyage.

For plague, the provisions of Article 27 shall be applied with regard to the rats which may be found on board the vessels.

ARTICLE 129

Suspicious vessels on board of which there were cases of plague in the six days following the embarkation and on board of which an unusual mortality of rats is discovered or cases of cholera at the time of departure but no new case in the last five days, shall be treated in the following manner:

The pilgrims shall be landed; take a shower or sea bath; and their soiled linen and the part of their wearing apparel and baggage which appears suspicious in the opinion of the health authority shall be disinfected; the parts of the vessel that have been occupied by the patients shall be disinfected. The duration of these operations, including debarkation and embarkation, shall not exceed forty-eight hours. Provided this period is not exceeded, such bacteriological examination as may be considered necessary by the sanitary authority may be made.

If no real or suspected case of plague or cholera is discovered during these operations, the pilgrims shall be reembarked immediately and the vessel shall proceed to Jeddah.

For plague, the provisions of Article 26 shall be applicable with regard to the rats which may be found on board.

ARTICLE 130

Infected vessels, that is, those having cases of plague or cholera on board or having had cases of plague more than six days after embarkation, or cholera on board within five days, or on board of which rats infected by plague have been discovered, shall undergo the following treatment:

The persons stricken with plague or cholera shall be landed and isolated at the hospital. The other passengers shall be landed and isolated in groups comprising as few persons as possible, so that the whole number may not suffer with and for a particular group in which plague or cholera should develop.

The soiled linen, wearing apparel, and clothing of the crew and passengers, as well as the vessel, shall be disinfected.

However the local health authority may decide that the unloading of the heavy baggage and the cargo is not necessary, and that only a part of the vessel need be disinfected.

The passengers shall remain in the Camaran establishment five or six days according as whether the case is plague or cholera. If a new case should occur after disembarkation, the period of observation shall be extended by five days for cholera and six days for plague, to date from the isolation of the last case.

For plague, the measures prescribed by Article 25 shall be applied with regard to the rats, which may be found on board the vessels.

When these operations have been completed, the ship, having reembarked its pilgrims, shall be sent to Jeddah.

ARTICLE 131

Ships, to which Articles 128, 129, and 130 apply, will be subject to medical inspection on board on arrival at Jeddah.

If the result is favorable, the ship shall receive free pratique.

If, on the other hand, well established cases of plague or cholera have occurred on board during the voyage, or at the time of arrival at Jeddah, the sanitary authority of the Hedjaz may take all necessary measures subject to the provisions of Article 54.

ARTICLE 132

Every sanitary station designed to receive pilgrims should be provided with a trained, experienced, and sufficiently numerous staff, as well as with all the buildings and apparatus necessary to insure the application, in their entirety, of the measures to which said pilgrims are subject.

B. SANITARY MEASURES APPLICABLE TO PILGRIM SHIPS HAILING FROM NORTH OF PORT SAID AND BOUND TOWARD HEDJAZ

ARTICLE 133

If plague or cholera is not found to exist in the port of departure or its neighborhood, and if no case of plague or cholera has occurred during the passage, the vessel shall be immediately granted pratique.

ARTICLE 134

If plague or cholera is known to exist in the port of departure or its vicinity, or if a case of plague or cholera has occurred during the voyage, the vessel shall be subjected at Tor to the rules established for vessels coming from the south and stopping at Camaran. The vessels shall thereupon be granted pratique.

SECTION V.—Measures to be taken upon the return of pilgrims.

A. PILGRIM SHIPS RETURNING NORTHWARD

ARTICLE 135

Every vessel bound for Suez or for a Mediterranean port, having on board pilgrims or similar masses of persons, and hailing from a port of Hedjaz or from any other port on the Arabian coast of the Red Sea, must repair to Tor in order to undergo there the observation and the sanitary measures indicated in Articles 140 to 142.

ARTICLE 136

Pending the creation at the port of Akaba of a quarantine station meeting the requirements, pilgrims going from the Hedjaz to Akaba by sea shall undergo the necessary quarantine measures at Tor before landing at Akaba.

ARTICLE 137

Vessels bringing pilgrims back toward the Mediterranean shall pass through the canal in quarantine only.

ARTICLE 138

The agents of navigation companies and captains are warned that, after completing their observation period at the sanitary station of Tor, the Egyptian pilgrims will alone be permitted to leave the vessel permanently in order to return thereupon to their homes.

Only those pilgrims will be recognized as Egyptians or as residents of Egypt who are provided with a certificate of residence issued by an Egyptian authority and conforming to the established model.

Pilgrims other than Egyptians, can not be landed in an Egyptian port after leaving Tor, except by special permit under special conditions imposed by the Egyptian health authority, in accord with the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt. Consequently, navigation agents and captains are warned that the transshipment of pilgrims not residents of Egypt at Tor, Suez, Port Said, or Alexandria is forbidden except under a special permit for each case.

Vessels having pilgrims on board who are not Egyptian nationals shall be subject to the rules applicable to these pilgrims and shall not be received in any Egyptian port of the Mediterranean.

ARTICLE 139

Egyptian pilgrims shall undergo an observation of three days and a medical examination and if there be occasion, disinfection and disinsectisation at Tor, or any other station designated by the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt, pilgrims shall not be permitted to enter any Egyptian port in the Mediterranean.

ARTICLE 140

If plague or cholera is found to exist in Hedjaz or in the port from which the vessel hails, or if it has existed in Hedjaz during the course of the pilgrimage, the vessel shall be subjected at Tor to the rules adopted at Camaran for infected vessels.

The persons stricken with plague or cholera shall be landed and isolated in the hospitals. The other passengers shall be landed and isolated in groups composed of as few persons as possible, so that the whole number may not suffer with any particular group in which the plague or cholera should develop.

The soiled linen, wearing apparel, and clothing of the crew and passengers, as well as the baggage and cargo suspected of contamination shall be landed and disinfected. Their disinfection as well as that of the vessel shall be thorough.

However, the local health authority may decide that the unloading of the heavy baggage and the cargo is not necessary, and that only a part of the vessel need undergo disinfection.

The measures provided in Article 25 shall be applied with regard to the rats which may be found on board.

All the pilgrims shall be subjected to an observation of six full days from the day on which the disinfecting operations are completed, in the case of plague and five days in the case of cholera. If a case of plague or cholera has appeared in one section, the period of six or five days shall not begin for this section until the day on which the last case was discovered.

ARTICLE 141

In the case contemplated in the preceding article, the Egyptian pilgrims shall be subjected, besides, to an additional observation of three days.

ARTICLE 142

If plague or cholera is not found to exist either in Hedjaz or in the port from which the vessel hails, and has not been known to exist in Hedjaz during the course of the pilgrimage, the vessel shall be subjected at Tor to the rules adopted at Camaran for uninfected vessels.

The pilgrims shall be landed and take a shower or sea bath, and their soiled linen or the part of their wearing apparel and baggage which may appear suspicious in the opinion of the health authority shall be disinfected. The duration of these operations shall not exceed seventy-two hours.

However, a pilgrim ship, if it has had no plague or cholera patients during the course of the voyage from Djeddah to Yambo or Tor and if the individual medical examination made at Tor after debarkation establishes the fact that it contains no such patients, may be authorized by the Sanitary Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt to pass through the Suez Canal in quarantine even at night when the following four conditions are fulfilled:

1. Medical attendance shall be given on board by one or several physicians graduated and duly accepted;
2. The vessel shall be provided with disinfecting chambers in good working order;
3. It shall be shown that the number of pilgrims does not exceed that authorized by the pilgrimage regulations;
4. The captain shall bind himself to repair directly to the port which he names as his next call port.

The sanitary tax to be paid to the Quarantine administration shall be the same as the pilgrims would have paid had they remained in quarantine three days.

ARTICLE 143

A vessel which has had a suspicious case on board during the voyage from Tor to Suez may be sent back to Tor.

ARTICLE 144

The transshipment of pilgrims is strictly forbidden in Egyptian ports except by special permit and on the conditions laid by the Egyptian Sanitary authority in accord with the Maritime Sanitary and Quarantine Board of Egypt.

ARTICLE 145

Vessels leaving Hedjaz and having on board pilgrims who are bound for a port on the African shore of the Red Sea shall proceed directly to the quarantine station named by the territorial authority to which that port belongs, where they shall submit to the same quarantine procedure as at Tor.

ARTICLE 146

Vessels sailing from Hedjaz or from a port on the Arabian coast of the Red Sea, in which neither the plague nor cholera prevails, which have no pilgrims or similar groups of people on board, and have had no suspicious occurrence during the voyage, shall be granted pratique at Suez after a favorable medical inspection.

ARTICLE 147

Passengers coming from the Hedjaz who have accompanied the pilgrimage shall be subject to the same measures as pilgrims. The appellation of merchant or any other will not exempt them from the measures applicable to the pilgrims.

B. RETURNING PILGRIMS GOING NORTH BY CARAVAN

ARTICLE 148

Whatever the sanitary condition in the Hedjaz may be, pilgrims travelling by caravan must repair to one of the quarantine stations upon their route, there to undergo according to circumstances the measures prescribed by Articles 140 or 142 for pilgrims who have been landed.

C. PILGRIMS RETURNING SOUTHWARD

ARTICLE 149

In the event of the pilgrimage being infected, pilgrim-ships, returning to places south of the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, may be required, by directions of the Consular Authority of the countries to which the pilgrims are going to stop at Camaran and there undergo medical inspection.

SECTION VI.—Measures applicable to pilgrims travelling by the Hedjaz Railway

ARTICLE 150

The Governments of the countries through which the Hedjaz railway passes shall make all necessary arrangements to organize the sanitary supervision of pilgrims during their journey to the Holy Places, and the application of prophylactic measures in order to prevent the dissemination of infectious diseases presenting epidemic features bearing in mind the principles of the present Convention.

SECTION IV.—Sanitary information concerning the pilgrimage

ARTICLE 151

The Sanitary Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt will transmit periodically, and if occasion arises, by the speediest route, to the sanitary authorities of all the countries interested, and concurrently, to the International Office of Public Hygiene under the conditions provided by this convention, all sanitary information and reports that may come to its knowledge during the pilgrimage concerning the sanitary condition of the Hedjaz and the countries through which the pilgrims pass. It will also get up an annual report which shall be sent to the said authorities and the International Office of Public Hygiene.

CHAPTER III. SANCTIONS

ARTICLE 152

Every captain convicted of not having conformed, in the distribution of water, provisions, or fuel, to the obligations assumed by or for him, shall be liable to a fine of not more than fifty francs (gold) for every failure. This fine shall be collected for the benefit of the pilgrim who shall have been the victim of the default, and who shall prove that he has vainly demanded the execution of the agreement made.

Every captain convicted of having or having had on board a greater number of pilgrims than that which he is authorized to embark according to the provisions of subsection 1 of Article 113 shall be liable to a fine of not more than 125 francs (gold) for each pilgrim in excess.

The pilgrims in excess of the regular number shall be landed at the first station at which a competent authority resides, and the captain shall be obliged to furnish the landed pilgrims with the money necessary to pursue their voyage to their destination.

ARTICLE 158

TITLE IV. SURVEILLANCE AND EXECUTION

I. SANITARY, MARITIME, AND QUARANTINE BOARD OF EGYPT

ARTICLE 162

The Stipulations of Appendix III of the Sanitary Convention of Venice of January 30, 1892, concerning the composition, powers and duties, and operation of the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board of Egypt, are confirmed as they appear in the khedival decrees under date of June 19, 1893, and December 25, 1894, as well as in the ministerial decision of June 19, 1893.

The said decrees and decisions are annexed to the present convention.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the said decrees and decisions the high contracting parties agree that—

I. The number of Egyptian delegates on the Egyptian Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board shall be increased to five:

(1) The President of the Board, appointed by the Egyptian Government, and who will only have a casting vote;

(2) A European doctor of medicine, Inspector-General of the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Service;

(3) Three delegates appointed by the Egyptian Government.

II. The Veterinary Service of the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board shall be transferred to the Egyptian Government.

The following conditions shall be observed:

(1) The Egyptian Government will collect sanitary taxes on imported cattle not to exceed those now collected by the Egyptian Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board;

(2) The Egyptian Government undertakes in consequence to pay annually to the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board a sum representing the average of the excess of receipts over the expenditures of the said service during the three budgetary years preceding the date on which the present Convention is put into force.

(3) The measures to be taken for the disinfection of cattle ships, of skins, and of other animal derivatives, shall be as in the past in charge of the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board.

(4) The foreign personnel now in the veterinary service of the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board will be granted the benefit of the salaries appropriated by Law No. 28 of 1923, regarding the conditions of service and the retirement or discharge of officials, employees or agents of foreign nationality.

Grading of salaries shall be as provided by the above-mentioned law. The other details will be fixed by an agreement between the Egyptian Government and the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board.

III. On account of the great distance between the Port of Suakim and the headquarters of the Egyptian Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board at Alexandria, and the fact that the pilgrims and passengers who disembark in this port of Suakim concern from the sanitary point of view only the territory of the Soudan, the sanitary administration of this port will be detached from the said Board.

ARTICLE 164

The ordinary expenses resulting from the provisions of the present convention, especially those relating to the increase of the personnel belonging to the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board of Egypt, shall be covered by means of an annual supplementary payment by the Egyptian Government of the sum of 4,000 Egyptian pounds, which may be taken from the surplus revenues from the lighthouse service remaining at the disposal of said Government.

However, the proceeds of a supplementary quarantine tax of ten tariff dollars per pilgrim to be collected at Tor shall be deducted from this sum.

In case the Egyptian Government shall find difficulty in bearing this share of the expenses, the Powers represented in the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board shall reach an understanding with that Government in order to insure the participation of the latter in the expenses contemplated.

ARTICLE 165

The Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board of Egypt shall undertake the task of bringing the provisions of the present convention into conformity with the regulations at present enforced by it in regard to the plague, cholera, and yellow fever, as well as with the regulations relative to arrivals from the Arabian ports of the Red Sea during the pilgrim season.

To the same end it shall, if occasion arises, revise the general regulations of the sanitary, maritime, and quarantine police at present in force.

These regulations, in order to become effective must be accepted by the various powers represented on the Board.

II. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 166

The proceeds from the sanitary taxes and fines collected by the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board shall in no case be employed for objects other than those within the province of the said Board.

ARTICLE 167

The High Contracting Parties agree to have a set of instructions prepared by their health departments for the purpose of enabling captains of vessels, especially when there is no physician on board, to enforce the provisions contained in the present convention with regard to plague, cholera, and yellow fever.

TITLE V. FINAL PROVISIONS

ARTICLE 168

The present Convention supersedes, as between the High Contracting Parties, the provisions of the Convention signed at Paris on January 17th, 1912, and also, the case arising, those of the Convention signed at Paris on December 3rd, 1903. These two last named Conventions will remain in force as between the High Contracting Parties and any State which is a party thereto and is not a party to the present Convention.

ARTICLE 169

The present Convention will bear to-day's date and may be signed up to October 1st of the current year.

ARTICLE 170

The present Convention shall be ratified and the ratifications shall be deposited at Paris as soon as possible. It shall not come into force until it has been ratified by ten of the High Contracting Parties. Thereafter it will take effect as regards each High Contracting Party from the date of the deposit of its ratification.

ARTICLE 171

The States which have not signed the present convention shall be permitted to adhere thereto upon request. Notice of this adhesion shall be given through diplomatic channels to the Government of the French Republic and by the latter to the other Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE 172

Any of the High Contracting Parties may declare, at the moment either of his signature, ratification or accession, that his acceptance of the present Convention does not include neither all nor any of the protectorates, colonies, possessions or mandated territories, and may subsequently accede, in accordance with the preceding Article, on behalf of any one of its protectorates, colonies, possessions or mandated territories excluded by such declaration.

In faith whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention.

Done at Paris the twenty-first day of June, nineteen hundred and twenty-six, in a single copy, which will remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the French Republic; and of which certified copies will be transmitted through the diplomatic channel to the other Contracting Parties.

Khedival decree of June 19, 1893

We, Khedive of Egypt, on the recommendation of Our Minister of the Interior, with the advice and consent of our Cabinet, and considering that it is necessary to introduce various amendments in our decree of January 3, 1881 (2 Safer 1298), decree:

ART. 1. The Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board shall decide on the measures to be taken to prevent the introduction into Egypt, or the transmission to foreign countries, of epidemic diseases and epizootics.

ART. 2. The number of Egyptian delegates shall be reduced to four, as follows:

1. The President of the Board, appointed by the Egyptian Government and to vote only in case of a tie.

2. A European doctor of medicine, Inspector General of the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Service.

3. The Sanitary Inspector of the city of Alexandria, or whoever acts in that capacity.

4. The Veterinary Inspector of the Administration of sanitary services and public hygiene.

All the Delegates must be physicians holding a regular diploma, granted either by a European faculty of medicine or by the Government, or be regularly appointed officials in actual service, of the grade of vice consul at least, or of an equivalent grade. This provision is not applicable to the present incumbents.

ART. 3. The Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board shall exercise permanent supervision over the sanitary condition of Egypt and over arrivals from foreign countries.

ART. 4. However, the Board shall without delay examine into the means of balancing the receipts and expenditures. Its recommendations shall be transmitted by the President to the Minister of the Interior. Any surplus that may exist shall accrue to the treasury of the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board; it shall, after a decision is reached by the Sanitary Board and ratified by the Cabinet, be devoted exclusively to the creation of a reserve fund for use in emergencies.

ART. 25. The President shall be obliged to order voting done by secret ballot whenever three members of the Board so request. Voting by secret ballot shall be compulsory whenever it is a question of the choice of Delegates of the Powers to form part of the Disciplinary Committee or of the Committee on Finances and when it is a question of appointing, dismissing, transferring, or promoting employees.

ABBAS HILMI.

By the Khedive:

RIAZ,

Head of the Cabinet, Minister of the Interior.

Khedival decree of December 25, 1894.

We, Khedive of Egypt, on the recommendation of Our Minister of Finance, with the advice and consent of our Cabinet, with the consent of the Commissioner-Directors of the Public Debt Fund as regards article 7, and with the consent of the Powers, decree:

ART. 1. Beginning with the fiscal year 1894, there shall be deducted annually from the present receipts of lighthouse dues the sum of 40,000 pounds Egyptian, which shall be employed as explained in the following articles.

ART. 2. The sum deducted in 1894 shall be used: 1st To cover any deficit during the fiscal year 1894 of the Quarantine Board, in case it has been impossible to entirely cover such deficit with the resources derived from the reserve fund of said Board, as will be stated in the following article; 2d to meet the extraordinary expenses necessitated by the fitting up of the sanitary establishments of Tor, Suez, and Moses Spring.

ART. 3. The present reserve fund of the Quarantine Board will be used to cover the deficit of the fiscal year 1894, and it shall not be reduced to an amount less than 10,000 pounds Egyptian.

If the deficit should not be fully covered, the remainder shall be met with the resources created in article 1.

ART. 4. From the sum of 80,000 pounds Egyptian derived from the fiscal years 1895 and 1896 there shall be deducted: 1st An amount equal to that which has been paid out in 1894 from the same receipts, to be applied to the deficit of said year 1894, so as to bring up to 40,000 pounds Egyptian the sums allotted to the extraordinary works provided for in article 1 for Tor, Suez, and Moses Spring; 2d the sums necessary in order to cover the deficit of the budget of the Quarantine Board for the fiscal years 1895 and 1896.

After the aforementioned deduction has been made, the surplus shall be devoted to the construction of new lighthouses in the Red Sea.

ART. 5. Beginning with the fiscal year 1897, this annual sum of 40,000 Egyptian pounds shall be used to cover possible deficits of the Quarantine Board. The amount necessary for this purpose shall be conclusively determined by taking as a basis the financial results of the fiscal years 1894 and 1895 of the Board.

The surplus shall be devoted to a reduction in the lighthouse dues, it being understood that these dues shall be reduced in the same proportion in the Red Sea and the Mediterranean.

ART. 6. In consideration of the aforementioned deductions and allotments the Government shall, beginning with 1894, be relieved of any obligation in regard to the expenses, ordinary or extraordinary of the Quarantine Board.

It is understood, however, that the expenses borne hitherto by the Egyptian Government shall continue to be borne by it.

ART. 7. Beginning with the fiscal year 1894, upon the settlement of account of the excesses with the Public Debt Fund, the share of these excesses due the Government shall be increased by an annual sum of 20,000 pounds Egyptian.

ART. 8. It has been agreed between the Egyptian Government and the Governments of Germany, Belgium, Great Britain, and Italy that the sum alloted to a reduction of the lighthouse dues, in accordance with article 5 to the present decree, shall be deducted from the sum of 40,000 pounds Egyptian provided for in the letters annexed to the Commercial Conventions concluded between Egypt and said Governments.

ART. 9. Our Minister of Finance is charged with the enforcement of the present decree.

Done at the Palace of Koubbeh, December 25, 1894.

During the intervals between his rounds of inspection, the Inspector General shall, under the authority of the President, take part in the direction of the general service. He shall take the place of the President in case of absence or impediment.

TITLE II.—SERVICE OF PORTS, QUARANTINE STATIONS, AND SANITARY STATIONS

ART. 11. The directors of the health offices shall have the direction of and be responsible for the service both of the office at the head of which they are placed and of the sanitary posts thereunder.

They shall see to the strict enforcement of the regulations on sanitary, maritime, and quarantine police. They shall obey the instructions they receive from the President of the Board and shall give the necessary orders and instructions to all the employees of their office, as well as to the employees of the sanitary posts attached thereto.

They shall be charged with the examination and speaking of vessels and with the application of the quarantine measures, and, in the cases provided by the regulations, they shall proceed to make medical inspections and inquiries regarding violations of quarantines.

In administrative matters they shall correspond only with the President, to whom they shall transmit all sanitary information which they gather while discharging their duties.

They shall compel vessels arriving at their ports with a foul bill of health or under irregular conditions to put into a port where there is a health office.

They can not make sanitary inquests themselves, but they must call upon the director of their office for this purpose.

Outside of cases of absolute urgency, they shall correspond only with this director in all administrative matters. In urgent sanitary and quarantine matters, such as the measures to be taken in regard to an arriving vessel, or the annotation to be made on the bill of health of a departing vessel, they shall correspond directly with the President of the Board; but they must communicate this correspondence to their director without delay.

They shall be obliged to give notice, by the quickest route, to the President of the Board regarding shipwrecks of which they have knowledge.

ART. 16. The sanitary posts shall be six in number, as follows:

ART. 18. It shall be the duty of the directors to compel persons sent to the sanitary station or the camp to submit to quarantine. They shall cooperate with the physicians in isolating the different categories of quarantined persons and in preventing any jeopardization. Upon the expiration of the period fixed, they shall grant or withhold pratique in accordance with the regulations, cause merchandise and wearing apparel to be disinfected, and apply quarantine to the persons employed in this operation.

ART. 19. They shall exercise constant supervision over the execution of the measures prescribed, as well as over the state of health of the quarantined persons and the employees of the establishment.

ART. 23. The expenses of the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Service shall be defrayed with the means at the disposal of the Board itself, or, with the consent of the Ministry of Finance, from such fund as the latter may designate.

PROTOCOL OF SIGNATURE

The undersigned Plenipotentiaries met on the date of this day for the purpose of signing the International Sanitary Convention.

The Plenipotentiaries of the German Empire referring to Article 25 make express reservations as to the power granted by the Convention to several governments to enforce the observation in case of bubonic plague.

The Plenipotentiaries of Brazil declare they are empowered to sign the Convention ad referendum under the reservations entered in the minutes of the last plenary session.

The Plenipotentiaries of Chili declare that they join in the reservations made by the Plenipotentiaries of Brazil and Portugal.

The Plenipotentiaries of China express reservations in the name of their Government concerning the engagement appearing in Article 8, 2nd Section, that it would be compulsory to declare the diseases coming under the Convention.

In the name of their Government the Plenipotentiaries of Egypt renew the express reservations made by them concerning the presence at the Convention of a delegate representing the Soudan. They furthermore declare that the said presence could not in any way affect the rights of sovereignty of Egypt.

The Plenipotentiaries of Spain declare they make in the name of their Government a reservation identical with that of the Plenipotentiaries of the United States of America concerning article 12.

The Plenipotentiaries of the United States of America formally declare that their signing the International Sanitary Convention of this date is not to be construed to mean that the United States of America recognizes a régime or entity acting as Government of a signatory or adhering Power when that régime or entity is not recognized by the United States as the Government of that Power. They further declare that the participation of the United States of America in the International Sanitary Convention of this date does not involve any contractual obligation on the part of the United States to a signatory or adhering Power represented by a régime or entity which the United States does not recognize as representing the Government of that Power, until it is represented by a Government recognized by the United States.

The Plenipotentiaries of the United States of America declared, furthermore, that their Government reserves to itself the right to decide whether from the standpoint of the measures to be applied a foreign district is to be considered as infected and to decide what measures shall be applied to arrival in its own ports under special circumstances.

The great work accomplished by the International Sanitary Convention and the many new provisions carried could not be referred by telegraph to Her Majesty the Queen of the Kings and to His Imperial and Royal Highness Prince Tafari Makonnen, Heir to and Regent of the Empire and the Delegate of the Ethiopian Empire declares that he must refrain from signing the Convention before he receives the necessary instructions.

The British Plenipotentiaries declare that their signing does not bind any part of the British Empire that is a distinct member of the League of Nations and would not sign separately or adhere to the Convention.

They further declared that they reserve the right not to apply the provisions of the 2nd subsection of article 8 to all the Protectorates, Colonies, Possessions or Countries under the British mandate which might be parties to the Convention and which on practical grounds might be unable to give full effect to those provisions relative to the compulsory declaration of the diseases referred to in the said article.

The Delegate of Canada reserves for his Government the right to decide whether from the viewpoint of the measures to be applied a foreign district is to be considered as infected and to decide what measures shall be applied to arrivals in Canadian ports under special circumstances. Subject to that reservation the Delegate from Canada declares that his Government is ready to take into consideration the obligations of article 12 of the Convention and the official information it may receive concerning the existence of the diseases in foreign countries.

The Delegate of India declares that he is authorized to sign the International Sanitary Convention under the reservation that on grounds of a practical nature India is not in a position to assume the obligations resulting from article 8 in so far as it has to do with the obligatory declaration of the diseases named in said article, except in large cities or in cases of epidemic.

The British Plenipotentiaries declare and wish to have it made a record that the reservation of the Plenipotentiaries of Persia about article 90 cannot in any way modify the present statu quo pending an agreement to be arrived at between the Persian and British Governments.

The Plenipotentiaries of the Finnish Republic declare that immunization from cholera does not constitute a sufficient guarantee and that their Government reserves to itself notwithstanding the provisions of article 30, the right to make, if the occasion arises, immune persons undergo observation.

On the other hand, considering that the traffic of the Finnish border could only go over two railways in the east very close to each other and a single railway in the west which does not make it permissible to contemplate a partial closing of the frontier, Finland in order to avoid the complete closing in case of epidemic reserves to itself the right to set up observation if occasion arises notwithstanding the provisions in article 58.

The Plenipotentiaries of Japan declare that their Government reserves to itself the right: 1. To forward through the Eastern bureau of Singapore the notices and information, the mailing of which to the International Office of Public Hygiene is required by the Convention; 2. To take such measures as the sanitary authorities may deem necessary with regard to carriers of cholera vibrios.

The Plenipotentiaries of Lithuania declare that though adhering to the Convention, they make special reservations as to its being put into practice between Lithuania and Poland as long as normal relations between the two countries shall not have been restored.

These reservations are of particular importance with respect to the provisions in articles 9, 196, 57 and 66.

The Plenipotentiaries of The Netherlands declare in the name of their Government that it reserves to itself with regard to the Dutch East Indies to enforce the measures provided in article 10, sub-section 2 in the same degree to arrivals from districts afflicted with murine plague.

They further declare that their Government reserves to itself with respect to the Dutch East Indies the right to put on article 27–2 a construction to the effect that the destruction of rats referred to in that article may be applied to vessels taking a cargo from a district afflicted with murine plague when the sanitary authority believes that the cargo is likely to carry rats and is stowed in such a way as to make it impossible to affect the search provided in the last sub-section of article 24.

The Plenipotentiaries of Persia declare that there is nothing warranting any special provision concerning the Persian Gulf being retained in the Convention. The fact that there is in the Convention article 90 constituting Section V of Title II, prevents their signing without making the most express reservations. The Plenipotentiaries of Persia further declare that the status quo could not in any way bind their Government. Again they reserve for their Government the right not to apply the provisions of article 8 relative to the obligatory declaration of the diseases coming under the said article.

The Plenipotentiary of Portugal declares that he is authorized by his Government to sign the Convention ad referendum with the reservations entered in the minutes of the last plenary session.

The Plenipotentiary of Turkey declares that Turkey would not relinquish by any treaty the right of being represented in the Sanitary, Maritime and Quarantine Board of Egypt. On the other hand taking into consideration the stipulations in the Convention of the Straits signed at Lausanne and the special conditions of the Straits of Bosphorus and Dardanelles, he reserves the right for the Sanitary Administration of Turkey to put a sanitary guard on board any merchant vessel going through the Straits without a physician and coming from an infected port so as to prevent that vessel from calling at any Turkish port. It is understood, however, that the delay and expenses that such a guard may entail will be very slight.

The Plenipotentiaries of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics, calling to mind the declarations made by them on May 26, at the session of the first Commission concerning article 7 of the draft of Convention declare they have no objection to offer to the provisions relative to the right of the International Office of Public Hygiene to make arrangements with other sanitary agencies; but they are of the opinion that that right flows from the arrangement of Rome of 1907 which defines the functions of the Office. They therefore believe that the provision hereinabove referred to is but a confirmation of that right and should only appear in the minutes and not be made an article of the Convention itself.

The Plenipotentiaries of the Union of the Soviet and Socialist Republics call to mind that at the time article 12 of the Convention was under consideration they cast their votes against the provision granting the Governments the right to prolong in exceptional cases the application of sanitary measures notwithstanding the declaration of the State concerned that there is no longer any danger of the disease.

They hold that that provision may infringe upon one of the fundamental principles of the previous conventions and become a cause of misunderstanding that could arise from its application.

They therefore declare that in the spirit of the Convention that provision can only be considered in exceptional cases when the Government to which the afflicted district belongs does not meet the obligations laid down by the Convention in that respect.

The Plenipotentiaries of the Soviet Socialist Republics call to mind that the reservations already made by them in second Commission concerning the functions, duties and powers of the sanitary, maritime and quarantine board of Egypt. They particularly wish to emphasize the fact that articles 70 and 164 in particular confer upon that board the right to set up different sanitary, maritime and quarantine police regulations on condition that those regulations in order to be capable of execution must be accepted by the different Powers represented in the Council. Inasmuch as the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics is not yet represented in the sanitary, maritime and quarantine board of Egypt, the Delegation of the Union wishes to reserve the rights of its Government to accept or not to accept the measures worked out by that board.

The undersigned make a formal acknowledgment of the reservations hereinabove set forth and declare that their own countries reserve to themselves the right to invoke the benefit thereof as against the countries in whose name they were made.

In witness whereof, the Plenipotentiaries have signed this Protocol.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, March 22, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

All glory and praise be unto Thee, O Lord most high. Thou dost stoop to our needs and failures and fold us in the embrace of Thy love. Thy power and beauty are all about us. We walk Thy earth and are cheered by Thy presence. The allurements of sin, the voice of temptation are not so harsh and abrupt as to shut off and dull divine love. We thank Thee for the ministry of Thy mercy, for the service of Thy strength, and for the wonderful providence with which Thou dost encircle us. O God be with us that our sun may never set in a moral night. Stay our footfall that we may ever listen to wise public opinion, the maxims, the refinements, and the restraints which form the unwritten code of public conduct. We ask for prudence to trust where we can not see our way, to avoid danger, to heed the warning of wisdom, and to realize and enjoy the treasures of the soul which enrich human life. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDRESS OF HON. FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT, OF NEW YORK

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made over the radio by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered over the radio by the Hon. FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT, of New York:

POWER REGULATION

Mr. DAVENPORT. Power in this country is coming more and more to mean electrical energy put to use. The electric light and power companies are the business corporations which produce and distribute electrical energy among the homes and workshops of the people. The electrical industry is a rapidly developing one, much more ably managed in the last 10 or 15 years than before that, with a great and prosperous future of service if it keeps its head; if it does not take advantage of its natural monopoly position to extort an unreasonable profit from the consumer or to exploit the investor, and if it recognizes that it has an important social as well as economic function.

There is a clear distinction between the privileges and obligations of a public utility, such as the electrical industry, and those of any ordinary private commercial business. It may be reasonably economical to have many independent grocery stores in a community, but it is uneconomical and a great waste to have more than one power and lighting system undertaking to give service in a community. Because of the essentially monopolistic character of a public utility, it is affected, as we say, by a public interest. It is permitted by law to enjoy freedom from competition, to earn a fair return, and to use the State's sovereign power of eminent domain to take for its own use, subject to the public service, the property of individuals and of private corporations. Such are its privileges. On the other hand, it has obligations. It may not discriminate unreasonably between its customers and it may exact only a fair return for its services. It is essentially and legally an agent of the public, and its rights and obligations are to be measured accordingly.

While it is within the sole option of the public to employ such an agency or to secure the services it desires through some other agency of its own creation, experience seems to indicate that the public service corporation can give as good service at less cost than direct public agencies if these corporations are willing to confine their rates to amounts that are reasonably proportionate to their own real cost of production. The country at the present time evidently wishes to avoid public ownership and operation of utilities if it can, fearing that public ownership would mean uneconomical political ownership; but there is no inherent reason why the public should select a corporation as its agent except on the expectation that by so doing it will secure a better service at the same price, or an equivalent service at a lower price.

Experience has abundantly shown that public service corporations, power companies and others, can not be left to their own devices. The States have established, therefore, what are known as public service commissions to exercise that power of regulation which is necessary and which is inherent in State sovereignty. A few States have strong commissions with adequate powers. In most States the regulating commissions have inadequate powers and niggardly appropriations to carry on their work, and appointments and policies are too frequently dictated by political considerations. These commissions will never fulfill their proper function until in quality of personnel, in tenure of office, and in freedom from political dictation they have the character of the best of our courts.

But even strong and intelligent State regulation would not be sufficient. The operations of the electrical-power utilities go far beyond the physical limits and legal authority of any State. The amount of energy transmitted in interstate commerce is at present a small fraction of the total produced, but it is rapidly increasing in amount and importance. Mergers of power corporations are being rapidly effected through the instrumentality of what are called holding companies. A holding company has in it opportunities for great good and also for great harm. In order that the possibilities of grave abuse in these processes shall not become actual the Federal Government, which now exercises scarcely any of its authority, should assume the necessary measures of control.

The regulation of public utility financing and practice has for its purpose not only the protection of the investor but also the maintenance of adequate service and reasonable rates to the consumer. What is a reasonable rate? Manifestly it is the lowest price at which in the long run under good management sufficient capital will be attracted to the public-utility business to keep it active, serviceable, and progressive. The consumer is of the opinion that the necessary capital can be secured on the basis of a fair return on the actual dollars invested. The producer is too frequently coming to contend that rates should be fixed on what it would cost to reproduce the property new, regardless of original cost or actual investment, and makes this claim oftentimes because under present conditions reproduction cost is greater than actual cost and makes a more profitable rate base. This is the point of most acute conflict to-day between the producer and consumer. From the standpoint of sound economics or of a wise social policy, values in excess of actual prudent investment are without justification, and the claim for such values is not consistent with the obligation of the agent toward his principal. The courts have recently lent a considerable measure of support to these latter-day claims for inflated capitalization on the part of public utilities, partly following decisions made at a time when the distinction between a private and a so-called quasi-public business had not been clearly worked out, and partly because of the handicap of limited economic training among jurists.

But if the so-called police power of the Constitution fails us, and we are able to secure only imperfect regulation of rates in the interest of the consumer from commissions and courts, we may invoke the contract power of the Constitution as the next logical step in public-service regulation. We may provide that the right to engage in new public-utility enterprise, and to expand existing ones, shall be granted under terms of a specific, enforceable contract in which rights and obligations, rate base and return thereon, shall be clearly set forth. This, if applied to the future, will infringe upon no vested rights. We need merely be careful not to destroy the incentive of private capital to invest in the industry, and not to regulate beyond the limits essential to protect the public interest.

If we succeed in establishing this regulation by contract power, how shall we know that the results are as good as we might get through the direct employment of public agencies? We can set up public standards—yardsticks—here and there; let the Government or an authority representing the Government sit in the power station and wholesale the energy to private distributing companies and apply the contract principle at Muscle Shoals, on the Colorado, and on the St. Lawrence and compare results with private-corporation projects. Such comparison should be rigidly made on sound scientific lines, because it is easy to deceive ourselves with superficial comparisons which omit significant factors.

This program of protection for the consumer proposes that the power industry shall be left in private hands as long as it is willing and able to give good service at a cost no greater than could be secured by direct public agencies. If the power industry takes a position which is in the long run economically and socially sound, it will not have to fight to maintain itself against a hostile or doubting public opinion. But if it takes the position that its public obligation is limited to that which laws may force upon it, and that it is entitled to collect for its services under cover of out-worn legal theory all that it may wring from weak or politically influenced or half-hearted regulation, it will have only itself to blame if it is discarded as an agency for public service. If public ownership and operation comes, it will not have been brought about, in this country at least, by the propaganda or political agitation of communists or Bolshevists or any other radically minded political or social group, but because of the failure of the industry itself to realize at the same time its privileges and its obligations.

LETTER TO SECRETARY KELLOGG CONCERNING RUMANIA

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter that I wrote to the Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg, on March 19, on the subject of loans to Rumania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by myself to the Secretary of State, under date of March 19, 1928, on the subject of loans to Rumania:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary State Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is bruited about Wall Street that the Government of Rumania is negotiating the floating of an international loan of $60,000,000, a major portion of which is to be offered to the American public. It apparently is to stabilize the finances of Rumania. It is rumored that the Federal reserve bank at New York will be expected to join other financial institutions here and abroad in extending credit to this most bureaucratic and most medieval Government in Europe.

Rumania, running true to its history, has made of itself during the last few years, as a result of pogroms and massacres of minority populations, a pariah among nations.

We, in America, stood aghast at the recent atrocities at Kishineff—outrages which we thought the postwar treaties had ended forever.

Rumania was bitterly condemned in the court of world opinion.

It was not the first time this benighted country stood condemned before the world. It has repeatedly violated the pledges given in the treaty of Berlin in 1878, wherein Disraeli demanded that it give assurance that it would treat its minority populations equitably as a price for its becoming an independent nation. Rumania has never kept a promise or a treaty. It never will.

It renewed its pledges at Versailles in 1919 only to break them at Oradea Mare this past year.

Now, its minister, Mr. George Cretziano, pledges his country to an honorable course for the future. But, however estimable Mr. Cretziano may be and however sincere personally, he can not bind the Bratiano dynasty and the Rumanian bureaucracy. He is a shadow. They the substance. Disapproval, no matter how harsh, criticism, no matter how bitter, have never made so much as a dent in the ironclad intolerance of this nation. Only the mailed fist or acts of other nations that threaten her security or self-interest have ever brought Rumania to terms. Secretary of State Hay, in 1902, forced her hand when he negotiated with the Government of Rumania for a convention of naturalization. He called attention to the treaty of Berlin, which prescribed—

"In Rumania, that difference of religious creeds and confessions shall not be alleged against any person as a ground for exclusion or incapacity in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil and political rights, admission to public employments, functions, and honors, or the exercise of the various professions and industries in any locality whatsoever."

He furthermore emphasized the fact that—

"with the lapse of time these prescriptions have been rendered nugatory in great part, as regards the native Jews, by the legislation and municipal regulations of Rumania."

And that—

"by the cumulative effect of successive restrictions the Jews of Rumania have become reduced to a state of wretched misery."

He indicated that the United States—

"can not be a tacit party to such an international wrong. It is constrained to protest against the treatment to which the Jews of Rumania are subjected not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury to itself, but in the name of humanity."

It is needless to state that Rumania came to terms under the threats hurled at her by Secretary of State Hay.

Under date of December 31, 1926, I called your attention to the mistreatment of Jews in the cities of Kishineff, Kalrash, Jassy, and Bucharest. I then suggested that what was said by Secretary Hay in 1902 might readily be said by you in 1926. You replied, under date of January 11, 1927, that the status of minorities had undergone considerable change since 1902 and that the rights of minorities in Rumania had been fixed by the treaty signed at Paris in 1919, and that any grievance suffered by minority populations might be redressed by the Council of the League of Nations. You therefore held that the League of Nations was the proper forum before which any infractions of the treaty might be brought. But since the said treaty was not ratified by the United States, we could not intervene.

Under date of January 12, 1927, I responded and stated that in my humble opinion the Paris treaty of 1919 did not create an exclusive remedy or set up an exclusive tribunal to which the recent excesses in Rumania might be referred. I felt that on grounds of lofty humanity our Government had the moral right of protest.

Now, this same Government, guilty of those excesses, is knocking at our doors and seeks financial assistance.

I respectfully petition that you in your great office as Secretary of State disapprove of any loan to Rumania.

Even at this very writing we are informed that anti-Semitic atrocities again threaten Rumanian Jews, and that the imminence of such atrocities was the gist of an alarming interpolation introduced into the Rumanian House of Parliament, on March 16, by one of its deputies.

While overtures made by the Rumanian minister to this country that he would endeavor to persuade his Government to renew its pledges of protection to minorities are most praiseworthy, and while his efforts should meet with encouragement, nevertheless Rumania should be forced to purge herself of her wrongs. She must be made to realize that she can expect no financial favors from us. That shall be her punishment.

Nearly three years ago the State Department closed American money markets to France, Italy, and Belgium until those countries agreed to settlement of their war-time debts to us. The ban has since been lifted as against Italy and Belgium, but the ban remains against France, although the State Department has agreed to the flotation of a French refunding loan, which would simply be a matter of refinancing at a lower interest rate.

If you placed embargoes against countries that failed to settle their debts with us, how much weightier is the reason for the similar ban against a country like Rumania which has so sinned against morality and decency.

If you had no jurisdiction to protest in December, 1926, surely you have jurisdiction now to show Rumania in a most effective manner how she has offended.

I am informed that the Chase National Bank was urged not to finance a loan to Soviet Russia because of our proscription against its form of government and the actions of its officials in their attempt to subvert our Government.

Since March, 1922, virtually all of the loans made abroad have been reviewed by the State Department; the bankers, at the suggestion of the department, having voluntarily submitted their proposals to the department in advance.

I offer no opinion as to the legality of the actions of the Department of State. I presume it is the right of the Executive, through his State Department, to direct the foreign relations of the Government.

I presume that no exception will be made and that Blair & Co., the New York bankers, who are handling the loan, and the Federal reserve bank at New York, through Governor Strong, will present to you, in the ordinary course, the application for the loan, for your approval or rejection.

I presume the application is already upon your desk. Would not your consent to that loan be construed as an approval of the acts of the government applying? You have assumed to censor the governments by disapproving loans to them because of their actions.

You stated that the policy of the State Department in this regard was as follows:

"It has objected to loans to countries which had not settled their debts to the United States, as it believed that it was not in the public interest to continue to make such loans, and it has objected to certain loans for armament and the monopolization of products consumed in the United States."

I, therefore, petition that you interdict any loan to Rumania by disapproving in the general public interest and upon grounds of high morality any application presented to you for that purpose.

Very truly yours,

EMANUEL CELLER, M. C.

SINKING OF THE SUBMARINE "S–4"

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes concerning a newspaper article appearing in the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, in my time I ask the Clerk to read the following short statement from the Washington Post.

The Clerk read as follows:

The salvage air line of the S–4 is found to be in working order, and through it air could have been pumped to the dying heroes who put up against death one of the gamest fights in the annals of our own or any other Navy. Why wasn't this done—and will Congress undertake to find out? If these brave men were abandoned to their fate without sufficient effort being made to save them, the country is entitled to know it.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, and ladies and gentlemen of the House, for 50 days the people of this Nation have been waiting for this Congress to act on a resolution which is now pending before the House and Senate and is before the conference committee for proper action. The distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee gave out a statement some time ago in which he said he did not believe the subject required further investigation. I want to know what kind of testimony this Congress desires in order that we might have a proper investigation of the S–4 submarine disaster.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I want to say that I never gave out any such statement. I never said it did not require further investigation. I deny it absolutely in every respect.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It was published by the press, and if the gentleman says he did not make it, then the error is with the person who wrote the article.

Mr. SNELL. There are a great many errors in the public press.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I accept the gentleman's statement, and I am glad he has corrected me.

I want to say that I have called the attention of the House to the fact that no proper investigation has been made with respect to the safety devices on submarines. I have called attention to the fact that there is a question as to whether or not the trial runs made by the S–4 were necessary. The statement has been made that the runs had all been made and that the S–4 should not have been ordered on its fatal cruise, and this morning we are confronted with a situation that shows that somebody in charge of the rescue of this ship failed to give these men the kind of aid that could have been given them if they had known all about submarines.

In addition to the charges that have been made I respectfully call your attention to the fact that it has been said that a cable ran from one compartment to another, thereby making it impossible for the doors to be closed. I would like to know if this is the situation that exists on all of our submarines at the present time. It seems to me that Congress should be awakened by these revelations so that those in charge may put the responsibility where it belongs. I would like to know if human sympathy is waning. Have we no respect for the dead? Such terrible catastrophes should make us have some respect for the Biblical injunctions that relate to the brotherhood of man. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the country has been watching the Congress and wondering whether we have not lost all interest in the disaster which befell the S–4. I have here a large number of editorial comments from newspapers, which presumably represent the best thought of the people on the subject of whether or not there should be a further investigation of that tragedy. The investigation by the naval board was far from satisfactory. I have many times inquired as to what progress may have been made by the conference committee in the way of settling the differences between House and Senate. We are satisfied that the House Members on the conference committee have been willing to compromise and reach an agreement. They are not responsible for the delay. I understand from reports which have reached me that our Members have expressed their willingness that the House and Senate should be represented on the proposed commission of investigation. We now seem to be agreed on that.

I am exceedingly sorry that we could not have had the investigating commission at work at this time, and in attendance at the Boston Navy Yard, where the ill-fated submarine now is, and the cause of the accident is being further investigated through an inspection of the boat herself.

During the past two days much of value has been learned, tending to clear up uncertain points, but there still remains much of mystery. We have been patiently waiting and hoping that "death notes" would be found to enlighten us further. I understand that but one note of this nature has been reported. Hope has been expressed by many that there are other messages which have been sent to the Navy Department, as would naturally be the case. Some fear has also been expressed lest some of these messages—if any more exist—might be suppressed, but we can not for an instant believe that the department would refuse to publish the contents of any note of this nature. We have been trusting that such messages left by the men who were alive for many hours after the accident would shed new light on the subject. If only one was written it is both strange and unfortunate.

I am sure that we have all read, with the greatest interest, the newspaper accounts of what has been discovered during the past few days. We read this morning that nearly all of the crew sacrificed their lives in an effort to save two or more of their number who were first entrapped. The statement is made that in the control room, which would presumably be the safest place, the occupants were forced out by reason of the gas, and also that there were at least three compartments which were still buoyant. The question which this morning once more arises in our minds is "Why did they not endeavor to tow the submarine ashore?" Failure to make such an attempt, at least, gave rise to one of the principal criticisms which was made on the floor of the House shortly after the accident. The explanation given at that time was to the effect that the gash made by the Paulding was probably so large that the S–4 might be torn asunder if an attempt to tow her was made. Some of us have felt, however, that it should have been tried.

Efforts have been made to place the blame for the accident, and the report of the board of inquiry made the captain of the Coast Guard destroyer a defendant. The Treasury Department had no representation on the board and, of course, the Coast Guard should have been represented. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, there still remain many matters connected with this tragedy which should be considered in addition to the "safety device" feature.

The public demands the right to know everything possible about why the accident occurred and what is to be done to prevent a similar tragedy happening again.

We should fix the responsibility by such a commission as is now contemplated. The committee for the House has, apparently, been acting fairly in the matter, but I believe that the Congress should now insist that it be brought to an immediate conclusion. I previously advocated the placing of one or more Senators and Representatives on that commission so that the public might not feel that this body was trying to evade any responsibility, and I feel the same to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not at this time intend to say anything about the conference in regard to the sinking of the S–4 and the House joint resolution on that matter. I did intend to say something about it within the next two or three days. However, inasmuch as the open charge is made that the conferees on the part of the House have not done their duty, I think it is only due to the conferees that I make a statement at this time.

As the House well knows, we passed a joint resolution almost unanimously, setting up a commission to investigate everything in connection with the safety devices, improvements, and the general management and construction of submarines. Also there was one special section that gave that commission special authority to investigate the sinking of the S–4. We sent that joint resolution over to the Senate. They were not willing to accept it. Instead the Senate passed a resolution setting up a separate joint committee of House and Senate to investigate the sinking of the S–4, and took that special authority away from the commission, and they said they were willing that we should make the other investigation. The position of the House conferees was that it was absolutely impossible to make an investigation without covering practically the entire subject; that sections 2 and 3 were so closely connected in every way that they could not, as far as practicable results are concerned, be separated. We have taken the position that we want a full and complete investigation of everything connected with the submarine service by men trained to do it, and we were absolutely opposed to having two investigations of practically the same subject going on at the same time.

But in order to meet views of the Senate, we were willing to compromise with them, and allow them to add to the commission that the House had set up two or three Members from the Senate and same number of Members from the House, to make one investigation and do it at the same time. This would preserve every right of Senate and House and be a dignified procedure. And that was also what the President and Navy Department wants. We met with the Senate conferees early after the appointment of the conferees. We have had at least three meetings. We have done the best we could to reach an agreement and to bring about an investigation. We think we have gone half way in this entire matter. That is what conferences are for. We have not put a single stone in the way of having a full and complete investigation of this whole subject. We honestly want one. The country wants one, but they do not want a purely political one. We do not feel that we are at all to blame. We feel that we have carried out the wishes of the House as far as we could, and we are willing to compromise and go half way in meeting the position the Senate has taken in regard to the investigation. In this I believe I speak the views of all the House conferees.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Does not the gentleman think that the House should be willing to have a joint committee of the House and the Senate make this investigation, if we could not get anything else?

Mr. SNELL. I would not say we would not be, but it is generally understood and every man knows that if we want to investigate this whole subject thoroughly and go into the safety devices and construction and operation of these submarines, we must have some men who are technically informed, some men who are engineers, trained in that line of work, in order to make a complete and satisfactory investigation, not only to the House, but to the country as a whole. That was the reason why we have stood for the principle of the House resolution. You must have the proper kind of a commission or it would be a farce.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I wanted to find out whether or not the committee had discussed that phase of the situation; as to whether or not they could get together and agree upon a plan which will enable the Senate and House to make an investigation in case you could not agree upon any other plan.

Mr. SNELL. I have tried to make it plain to the country and to the House, without going into the particular discussions that were had by the conferees.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. POU. I want to ask whether or not the position of the House conferees was not that there should not only be an investigation of the S–4 disaster, but a further investigation as to safety devices throughout the world?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; everything that could possibly be covered in connection with the manufacture and operation of the submarine in the United States and the world at large.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I have two or three minutes more?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Has the chairman of the committee considered this thought, that in case the conferees can not agree he would be willing that either branch of the Congress should make this investigation?

Mr. SNELL. What good would it do to have just a congressional committee alone to make the investigation?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I think good would be done by any committee that would bring out the facts in connection with this controversy so as to safeguard the service in the future. I think such a committee would perform a great service.

Mr. SNELL. I would not say I would oppose that, but I think the position of the House is the best one if you want to get a full and complete investigation.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Another question. Will the House conferees meet in the near future with the Senate conferees with the hope of an agreement?

Mr. SNELL. I do not care to answer that question at the present time.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I would like to know whether such a proposition was considered.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The function of this committee is not only to serve as a fact-finding body, but also as an expert commission to decide upon the question of construction and future use of the submarine?

Mr. SNELL. That is the principal thing. Facts were found out by the investigation conducted by the Navy. In regard to what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] said about my position on the investigation made by the Navy, I want to make it perfectly clear. I think that so far as the naval inquiry went in making the investigation they did what they could, but I never thought that that was all the conferees had in mind in regard to a complete investigation of the whole subject.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I thank the gentleman for his statement. The reason why I called attention to the fact is that the newspapers did carry the story that the gentleman was satisfied with the inquiry that had been made.

Mr. SNELL. I said I was satisfied in so far as they had gone, but that was not a complete investigation of the subject.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The conferees have been united, have they not?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; the conferees have been united since the investigation first started and have tried to carry out the expressed will of the House.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ROAD CONGRESSES

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 31, providing that the United States extend to the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses an invitation to hold the sixth session of the association in the United States, and for the expenses thereof. Action must be taken before April 1 if we are going to do it at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland desires to call up Senate Joint Resolution 31. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 31) to provide that the United States extend to the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses an invitation to hold the sixth session of the association in the United States, and for the expenses thereof.

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses an invitation to hold the sixth session of the association in the United States, either in 1929 or 1930, as the association may determine.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of such session, including printing of reports, compensation of employees, transportation, subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), and such expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of such invitation in the observance of appropriate courtesies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think we should have some explanation of this matter before it goes further.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am perfectly willing to explain it. We want this congress to meet in this country this year.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. BEGG. Has that resolution been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; it has been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BEGG. Of the House?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; it has been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. It passed the Senate and was reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House.

Mr. BEGG. Is it upon the calendar?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; it is upon the calendar.

Mr. BEGG. Has the gentleman discussed the matter with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as to its being called up?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes. The full committee understands it. It is essential and necessary to take it up before April 1; otherwise it will be too late. The President, of course, has the right to invite this road congress to meet here, but under the law we must have certain legislation for an appropriation. That is the purpose of this resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. How much money is involved in this?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Twenty-five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary. It is a very important matter, because these gentlemen hitherto have been meeting in various parts of the world. It will bring men here from all over the world to discuss the question of roads.

Mr. MADDEN. Has this question ever been submitted to the House?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It never has been submitted to the House, but it has been objected to.

Mr. MADDEN. Has any chance been given to the House to consider it?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It never has.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I will object.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to know what the gentleman means by consideration. It has been passed by the Senate. Referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House and by that committee reported favorably through me.

Mr. MADDEN. That does not bind me.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I hope the gentleman will not object as it is a very important matter.

Mr. MADDEN. As I say, that does not bind me and I object for the time being.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12286, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12286, the naval appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] had occupied 55 minutes of time in general debate and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] 67 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER].

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the March North American Review, whose editorial and executive office is in New York, and publication office in Concord, N. H., there appeared an article under the name of one J. M. Scanland, whose residence is Los Angeles, Calif., and under the title "Reducing States to Territories."

In the main, the article is an attack upon Arizona. There are few, if any, who knowing all the circumstances will fail to find the animus in the assault upon Arizona. The Arizona Representative in the House is abundantly able to take up the gage of battle for his State and I do not rise for that purpose.

I have taken the floor for the reason that this same article contains a most untrue, inexcusable, and libelous passage specifically against Wyoming. The question naturally arises as to the animating motive of the writer in his attack upon my State. Whom does Mr. Scanland represent? I am loth to believe that he represents anyone but himself. I now quote his written statement concerning Wyoming from the magazine I have mentioned:

Another constitutional question arises in the case of the decaying State of Wyoming. It wants to go out, or rather be turned back into a Territory, with a Territorial government, which would be mainly supported by the General Government. It has not violated any provision of the enabling act, but alleges that it is too poor to support a State government. It is mostly a stock and grazing country, and the population is shifting, unsteady, and unproductive. Within the last few years Wyoming has shown very little increase in the number of its inhabitants, and a large number of these are not really citizens. According to the census of 1920, the State had a population of 194,402, or about 17,000 less than the basis for a Representative in Congress. It is reported that its few industrial resources are declining, and the people have held meetings, from time to time, and will petition Congress to "dissolve" the State Government. They allege that the expenses are more than they can bear, and they desire to get rid of a horde of officials.

* * * With Wyoming, there is an easier way out: A State can dissolve itself by refusing or failing to elect State officials, just as a cross-roads village commits suicide by refusing to collect taxes. True, some State officials may cling to their offices "until their successors are qualified," under a technicality. But if the people generally refuse to elect their successors, and, worse than all, refuse to pay taxes, the State will die a natural death. Another way out is by annexation. Wyoming can ask to be annexed to one or more of the adjoining States. This can be done by the willingness of the other State or States to receive the unprosperous State.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. May I inquire of the gentleman who wrote that article?

Mr. WINTER. One J. M. Scanland, who resides in Los Angeles, Calif. I have already indicated that under all of the conditions and circumstances there may be those who surmise a motive.

It is difficult to find language, permissible on this floor, sufficiently strong to properly characterize this defaming article. I brand every statement of alleged fact or conclusion in that passage, excepting the census return for 1920, as an absolute falsehood. No shadow of excuse, mitigation, or extenuation can exist. The writer could not have been ignorant of the facts. He must have known better, and therefore he is a deliberate libeler. Insanity or decadent senility of the writer are the only possible explanations, other than malicious falsehood.

There is no sounder, healthier, or more promising State than Wyoming. Only an ignoramus or scandalmonger would use the word "decaying" in connection with that State.

Wyoming is not limited to a "stock and grazing industry." Incidentally its sheep industry numbers 3,000,000 head, producing 25,000,000 pounds of wool annually, ranking next to Texas, which is first, and which has an area more than two and one-half times as large as Wyoming.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Texas is also first in a good many other things than wool, is it not—in cotton, oil, and other products?

Mr. WINTER. I do not dispute that. I am stating here that Texas is first in sheep and wool, but, area for area, Wyoming surpasses it in that industry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I appreciate the compliment.

Mr. WINTER. Cattle last year numbered 594,000, with a valuation of $14,540,000. Hogs last year produced $1,900,000. But the agricultural wealth produced in 1926 was $71,000,000. The mineral wealth produced in the same year was $78,000,000. The assessed valuation for tax purposes in Wyoming in 1927 was $457,000,000. It has 1,500,000 acres of irrigated farms and as much more susceptible of irrigation. It ships tremendous amounts of honey and turkeys, seed peas, seed beans, and seed potatoes. It has four sugar-beet factories, and more planned. It produces fruits and highest-class vegetables for shipment.

In 1927 Wyoming produced 21,000,000 barrels of oil, 6,400,000 tons of coal, 603,000 tons of iron; private capital has just finished the building of a $2,000,000 cement plant near Laramie. Our State is just beginning the development of vast proven resources of coal, iron, oil, asbestos, potash, phosphate, sodium, aluminum, gypsum, and other valuable deposits, all together estimated to be of a value of many billions of dollars. Our water-power possibilities are almost incalculable. It has 3,500 square miles of oil-shale surface deposits containing, according to Government reports, 21,000,000,000 barrels of oil. There are scores of great natural-gas fields supplying many of our towns with this greatest and finest fuel. It has 30,000 square miles of coal lands, sufficient to supply the United States for hundreds of years. It has 8,500,000 acres of forests. It has paid into the Treasury in the last 10 years, from its public lands and mineral royalties, $42,000,000, and will pay in as much more in the next 10 or 15 years. Wyoming produced last year in mineral, agricultural, livestock, and manufactured products $237,000,000. Here are some of the principal items:

MINERAL
Oil (refined value)	$110,000,000
Coal	18,000,000
Iron	450,000
Other minerals	2,500,000
AGRICULTURAL
Hay	15,000,000
Wheat	4,629,850
Sugar beets	3,524,000
Corn	3,104,200
Oats	2,432,320
Barley	1,641,600
Potatoes	2,106,000
Apples	53,200
Beans	740,000
Rye	586,000
Butterfat	94,100
Milk	859,574
Butter	1,477,000
Cheese	1,477,000
Poultry and eggs	1,963,000
LIVESTOCK
Cattle	$14,410,000
Sheep	11,400,000
Wool	7,876,050
Hogs	1,963,000
MANUFACTURING
Manufactured products	25,000,000

It ranks first of all the States in coal resources; second in the sheep industry; second in per capita wealth; fifth in oil production. This record is made with only 40 per cent of our area in private or State ownership. So much for the absurd proposition that our resources are declining. Such are the plain statistical records which are obtainable by any writer. There is no State of greater potential wealth. Yet a man states over his signature that we say we "are too poor to support a State government"!

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. WINTER. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I may say to the gentleman that I served with him on the committee for quite a while and I know his senior Senator very well. I have never yet ascertained but what Wyoming was a considerable factor in national legislation, and I can not figure out just how anybody could get the idea that they were trying not to be a State.

Mr. WINTER. I will go on with that subject a little further.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I hope the gentleman will not take offense at what I have put into his speech.

Mr. WINTER. I thank the gentleman for his remarks. I take them to be decidedly complimentary.

Our total State debt is only $1,919,000. But five States in the Union have a smaller debt. We paid $9,500,000 in taxes in 1926. We have no "horde of officials." Our State government is clean.

The statement that our people have held meetings for the purpose and will petition Congress to "dissolve State government" is so amazing and absurd as to cause amusement—amusement shot through with flashes of righteous indignation. The fact is that the Wyoming Legislature last year filed a memorial with Congress to cede the remaining public lands to the State. We are protesting against being kept in a state of dependency in any respect to the Federal Government, except as all States cooperate with and are assisted by the General Government under nation-wide policies applicable to all the States. Wyoming not only does not want to "go out or be turned back into a Territory, to be mainly supported by the General Government," an idea never spoken or dreamed of in our State, but, on the contrary, it is insisting upon its rightful place and full sovereignty as a sister State in the Union. It is crying out against dependency upon the General Government and pleading for full independence and jurisdiction, with right of taxation or its equivalent over its soil and resources. It objects to legislation which would forever keep 60 per cent of its area under Federal control, nontaxable, and force it to continue asking the Government for proportionate aid.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. The gentleman has said something about forest lands and I was glad to hear the gentleman speak about the forest lands of the West. I trust that when the program for southern reclamation, in Florida in particular comes in the gentleman will assist us.

Mr. WINTER. I listened with a great deal of sympathetic interest to the presentation before the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of views with respect to the bill introduced in that regard by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and I expect to give the matter further consideration in the committee.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. I yield.

Mr. ROMJUE. In view of what the gentleman has said about the vast amount of wool production in Wyoming, and from the general trend of his discussion, I judge Mr. Scanland has not yet pulled the wool over the eyes of the gentleman.

Mr. WINTER. No; my eyesight and insight are good and unimpaired. Far from being "shifting, unsteady, and unproductive," the population of Wyoming is unusually stable, steady, and productive. We have a per capita wealth of $4,663, ranking as the second State in the Union in that respect. We have had a uniform increase of population. From a population of 194,402 under the census of 1920, the estimate given out by the Census Bureau for July 1, 1928, was 247,000; an increase of 27 per cent in seven years.

Those who wrote the ordinances of 1787 and 1789 under the Constitution, provided that when an area contained 60,000 people it was qualified, so far as population was concerned, to be admitted into the Union as a State. Wyoming has four times that number and is increasing steadily. The States east of the Mississippi began statehood with little more than the required number. They had to be subsequently developed.

I hold before me the estimated population table just issued by the Census Department. According to this table, the population of Wyoming as of July 1, 1928, is now more than one-half that of New Hampshire, two-thirds that of Vermont, and 3,000 greater than that of Delaware. Yet no one ever proposed reducing these States to Territories. New York has not asked that Delaware, with its one Congressman, be demoted and her political representation in the Congress be annulled. Other States made no growth, according to this table, in population between 1920 and 1928, but no sane man would suggest for a moment that they are decaying or are too poor to sustain a State government, have exhausted their industrial or natural resources, and should be returned to a Territorial status.

As to the stability and ability of the people of Wyoming, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that Wyoming has furnished to the Nation Justice Van Devanter, of the United States Surpeme Court; Justice Van Orsdel, of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals; William C. Deming, president of the United States Civil Service Commission; Frank W. Mondell, former Republican floor leader of the House of Representatives, former member of the United States Finance Corporation, permanent chairman of the last Republican National Convention; Senator Joseph M. Carey, deceased, author of the Carey Act and other national legislation; Ex-Governor Robert D. Carey, chairman of the President's Agricultural Commission; Ex-Senator Clarence D. Clark, who was for many years chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee; John E. Osborne, once Assistant Secretary of State; Senator JOHN B. KENDRICK, mentioned as a possible candidate for the Vice Presidency on the Democratic ticket; and Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN, chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the United States Senate, who at 83 years of age is on active duty and who has a longer service in the Senate, 36 years, 34 years continuous, than any man in the history of the United States from its formation.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. The gentleman has overlooked the name of Buffalo Bill.

Mr. WINTER. No; I have not reached him in the list. I have not mentioned them all yet.

In authors of national fame, the following are found on Wyoming's scroll: Struthers Burt, Katherine Newlin Burt, Hal G. Evarts, Dr. Grace Raymond Hebard, Bill Nye became famous as the editor of the Laramie Boomerang. Buffalo Bill's home and life's work were at Cody, Wyo. Chancellor A. G. Crane, of the Wyoming University, is constantly sought to head the universities of larger States. For several years the debating team of our State university had the most remarkable percentage of winning debates of any team in the United States. Two years ago our debating team was given the decision here in Washington over the team of the George Washington University.

The records of our university, schools, churches, hospitals, fraternal orders, literary, art, musical, and service clubs denote a people of highest character and active aspirations.

Our "decadent" people furnished the greatest proportion of physically fit men out of the number examined in the World War of any State in the Union. Wyoming 87.64 per cent, California 78.34 per cent is the record. Based on the 1920 census, Wyoming sent 1 out of every 17 of her population into the ranks, 5.9 per cent. California sent 1 out of 30, which is 3.3 per cent. Two years ago the Legislature of Wyoming was presented with the Collier National Trophy for having made the highest record in the Union in the increase of percentage of votes cast for President out of the total qualified number of electors. Wyoming has fewer illiterates than 37 States in the Union. Our "decaying" State and people outrank in intelligence and education the State and people of California, the residence of the Scanlandmonger. We stand as the eleventh State and California the twenty-first in this respect. Our people are 92 per cent white and 87 per cent native-born American.

The whole article, which is an absolute misrepresentation from beginning to end, is so supremely ridiculous that it causes laughter in my State, but is so libelous that I am compelled to call your attention to the same and brand it as such. Ignorance is no excuse for such an attack. But it is not a question of mere ignorance and stupidity. Pure invention and mendacity is the only sufficient characterization. The author of the defamatory article has attempted to make a feeble defense when called upon to explain on what facts he based his statements, by citing a record showing that Wyoming did not of late years produce any copper, whereas it formerly produced some. Wyoming never was a great or permanent copper-producing State, but even if it had so claimed a downward variation or cessation in annual output does not even indicate, much less prove, that its "industrial resources are declining." California did not produce any diamonds last year. Is it therefore a decaying State? Again, he says a record shows we did not produce as much coal last year as the year before. What of it? If that is a criterion then Pennsylvania and Ohio and Illinois are decaying, and their industrial resources declining. Of course, everybody knows the condition of the coal industry was unfavorable and production was reduced in the last year throughout the Nation. Did California produce any coal last year? She did not. Hence, according to the Scanland logic, California is on the road to ruin and should be deprived of statehood. She produced but little more oil in 1927 than she did in 1926. Ergo, she is a decaying State, and her industrial resources are practically exhausted!

On these two items alone hangs the whole defense or attempted justification of the libel writer. How flimsy and utterly unavailing are these as facts to justify his statements! Thirdly, and lastly, he insists he saw "somewhere, sometime, something" in a paper of an account of a meeting in Wyoming where some people protested against high taxes!

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that the press generally and all of the business men's associations in the surrounding States have very loyally upheld the hands of Wyoming in this matter?

Mr. WINTER. They certainly have, and the people of Wyoming are very appreciative of that fact. Those close to us, our neighbors, who know us best, have resented this attack as much as we have.

And that is the extent of his alleged reason for the allegation that Wyoming "will petition Congress to dissolve the State government." In what State of this Union have there not been meetings and resolutions protesting against high taxes? Without searching the record, the answer is—none. These ridiculous and absurd statements constitute his entire defense. I assert, without further argument, that all these facts do not in the slightest degree tend to justify the passage I have quoted. It therefore seems apparent that we must look behind them for the motive of this utter and malicious misrepresentation. Just what the motive back of the malice of Mr. Scanland in the Review article is has not been fully revealed. In due time it will be further disclosed. We of Wyoming sincerely hope that California is not implicated and will repudiate this unfounded attack emanating from a Los Angeles writer. It is to be hoped that California Representatives will not countenance this infamous assault upon Wyoming, even by silence.

While the article is amazing in its untruthfulness, it is more astounding that a reputable magazine would print and publish it. The editor permitting this article to appear in his magazine merely offered to print any communication correcting alleged errors. This is not sufficient. This publication and those responsible for it have an affirmative duty to perform in making a complete retraction and apology.

At this point I submit the following, which has just come to hand, from the North American Review:

> We recognize the justice of the demands contained in the editorial of the Wyoming State Tribune with reference to article in the March issue North American Review, entitled "Reducing States to Territories." We desire to offer our sincere apologies and amende honorable for having given currency to statements, now revealed to be unsupported, reflecting upon the reputation and integrity of the State and citizens of Wyoming. We can only justify the acceptance for publication by quoting the State Tribune's phrase that "accidents may happen in the best-regulated families." Through the courtesy of Congressman WINTER we will publish his correcting statement in the earliest possible issue, which is the May number.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINTER. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does that come from the editor of this magazine?

Mr. WINTER. Yes. The editor of the North American Review. I thank him for the full and frank apology and trust the retraction and explanation will reach all who have read the article.

Wyoming has only begun to grow. It is young, vigorous, and filled with potential riches. With the records I have given I feel abundantly fortified in declaring that Wyoming will yet be one of the greatest States in the Union in population, wealth, and productiveness, as it now is in natural resources, undeveloped strength, in education, intelligence, character, high ideals, true Americanism, and patriotic devotion. We have an abiding faith in the greatness of our common country and in the honor and honesty of our Government. We believe in its principles, in its service to its own people, and to humanity. Wyoming, as one of the sisterhood of States, proud of its sovereignty, with honor and glory will do the full share of a State in fulfilling the high destiny of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE].

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman and Members, on February 23, I introduced in the House a resolution as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the restoration of a limitation on the importation, free of duty, of Philippine sugar

Whereas the encouragement and protection of the growth of the sugar beet and sugar cane in the United States, and of the production of beet and cane sugar, in the interest of agriculture and as a measure of economic stability and defense, has long been an important feature of our tariff policy; and

Whereas a continuation of such policy is highly important from the standpoint of agriculture and as a defense against the dangers inherent in a condition of dependence on foreign supplies of sugar; and

Whereas the Congress, in the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff act of 1909, which gave duty-free entry into our ports to most Philippine products, recognized the danger to the stability and growth of the domestic production of sugar, in an unlimited duty-free importation of sugar from a tropical region with cheap labor and practically unlimited areas favorable to the growth of sugar cane, and limited the duty-free importation of Philippine sugar to a maximum of 300,000 tons per annum, although less than 40,000 tons of Philippine sugar was imported into the United States in 1909; and

Whereas under this limitation and up to the time of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922, the importation of Philippine sugar had never reached 200,000 long tons per annum and had averaged less than 115,000 long tons per annum, and therefore the continuation of the limitation did not appear necessary or essential; and

Whereas the importation of Philippine sugar has increased from 147,212 long tons in 1921 to 473,674 long tons in 1927, being an increase of over 220 per cent; and

Whereas the privilege of an unlimited duty-free market for Philippine sugar in the United States tends to delay the further logical development by the Philippine people of their local oriental sugar markets and to make them largely dependent upon a single competitive export crop, contrary to the principles of diversified agriculture and industry upon which depend ultimate economic, cultural, and political progress; and

Whereas the unlimited and constantly increasing duty-free importation of Philippine sugar into the United States constitutes a grave menace to the continuation of the domestic sugar industry; and

Whereas there is no purpose or disposition to deprive the sugar producers of the Philippines of our free market to the extent to which they have heretofore enjoyed it but rather to protect the American beet and cane farmers and sugar producers from an indefinite increase of duty-free importations imperiling the existence of the domestic sugar industry: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That from and after the passage of this resolution sugar coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, the product of such islands, shall be admitted free of duty in an amount not in excess of 300,000 long tons in any one fiscal year.

I think the preamble and the resolution are self-explanatory, but the matters at issue are so important that I feel it my duty to review briefly the facts and conditions which, in my opinion, justify, and from a viewpoint of our American sugar-beet growers demand, the limitation of the duty-free importation of Philippine sugar.

ATTITUDE OF CONGRESS TOWARD PHILIPPINE SUGAR PRIOR TO 1913

A brief analysis of our tariff relations with the Philippine Islands, I believe, will demonstrate conclusively that the United States Government never intended to place the American farmer in unrestricted competition with the products of Philippine soil. While concessions have been made in our tariff laws in favor of Philippine sugar, a study of the various tariff acts and the conditions existing at the time of their passage will convince any fair-minded man that the Congress intended to protect the sugar-beet growers of the United States from competition with sugar produced in the Philippine Islands under tropical conditions of living and wages.

From the time the Philippine Islands were ceded to the United States by the treaty of peace April 11, 1899, until the passage of the so-called Philippine act of March 8, 1902, sugar and other products of the Philippine Islands entering our ports were assessed the same rates of duty as like products coming from other countries.

The act of March 8, 1902, provided that upon all articles the growth of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from such islands there should be levied, collected, and paid only 75 per cent of the rates of duty upon like articles imported from other countries.

The fact that the Congress saw fit to levy the full rate of duty on Philippine products entering the United States from the time of the acquisition of the islands in 1899 until the passage of the act of 1902, and by the passage of the latter act continued to levy such duty to the extent of 75 per cent of the rates levied against other countries, is conclusive evidence that the Congress intended to protect American farmers from competition with the cheaply produced products of Philippine soil.

The tariff act of August 5, 1909, the Payne-Aldrich Act, provided that all articles, the growth or product of the Philippine Islands, should be admitted into the United States free of duty, except rice and a specified amount of tobacco and cigars, and except in any fiscal year sugar in excess of 300,000 gross tons.

It will be seen from the above that while the act of 1909 placed most Philippine products on the free list, sugar was accorded a different status. At the time of the passage of this act less than 40,000 tons of Philippine sugar entered the ports of the United States annually, but the Congress even then recognized the potential future danger to the agricultural economy and production of domestic sugar from an unlimited expansion of the Philippine sugar industry and therefore limited the duty-free importation of sugar from the islands to 300,000 tons in any year.

WHY THE LIMITATION ON PHILIPPINE SUGAR IMPORTS WAS OMITTED IN TARIFF ACTS OF 1913 AND 1922

This 1909 limitation to 300,000 tons per annum remained in force until the enactment of the Underwood tariff in 1913, which materially reduced the tariff on sugar and provided that sugar should go to the free list May 1, 1916. Quite naturally the Philippine limitation was omitted from these provisions. On April 27, 1916, an act was approved which repealed the free-sugar provision of the Underwood Tariff Act three days prior to the time when it would have gone into effect. Chairman Kitchin, of the House Ways and Means Committee, in reporting this bill, stated that the legislation was necessary because the Treasury, owing to the decline in customs and other receipts, needed the revenue yield from sugar amounting at that time to nearly $45,000,000 net. As this action of the Democratic House was therefore taken from the standpoint of revenue, the Philippine situation was not considered.

When the Republican Congress took up the consideration of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 the importation of Philippine sugar had never reached 200,000 long tons in any one year and had averaged between 1919 and 1921 less than 115,000 long tons annually. The subsequent enormous increase of Philippine production and export was not then anticipated and therefore the restoration of the limitation upon the free importation of Philippine sugar did not appear to be necessary.

At this point I will insert in the RECORD a table showing the domestic beet-sugar production and imports of sugar into the United States from 1909 to 1927:

The failure of Congress to restore some limitation on the free importation of Philippine sugar under the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 coincides with the beginning of unprecedented expansion of the sugar industry in the Philippines. Production and imports soared; imports of duty-free sugar have hurdled the old 300,000-ton barrier which in 1909 seemed essential to the protection of the domestic sugar industry. Imports have increased from 147,212 long tons in 1921 to 473,674 tons in 1927, an increase of over 200 per cent, while during the period from 1909 to 1927, inclusive, the imports of Philippine sugar have increased over 1,168 per cent, and even this may be only an indication of greater gains in the immediate future.

A continuation of this constantly increasing flood of duty-free Philippine sugar, sent to the United States in bottoms not subject to our coastwise shipping laws, will eventually displace the million tons now contributed by the domestic industry.

In April, 1927, the freight rates on sugar per hundred pounds were approximately as follows:

	Cents
Cuba to New York	13½–14
Cuba to Galveston	11 –12
Cuba to New Orleans	10½–11½
Cuba to Boston	15 –16
Cuba to London	22½
Philippines to San Francisco	27
Philippines to New York	32
Porto Rico to New York	16
New York to Chicago (all rail)	56½
New York to Chicago (lake and rail)	51½
New York to St. Paul-Minneapolis (rail)	69
New York to St. Paul-Minneapolis (lake)	60½
New York to Missouri River	77½
California to Missouri River	84
California to Chicago	84
Denver to Chicago	56
Denver to St. Paul-Minneapolis	56
Salt Lake City to Chicago	69
Salt Lake City to St. Paul-Minneapolis	69
New Orleans to St. Paul-Minneapolis	66
New Orleans to St. Louis	53½
New Orleans to Chicago	54

To prevent further aggravation of this serious condition some limitation on duty-free imports must be restored. To restore the old 300,000-ton limitation would be claimed to be unfair, but to restore a limitation at 500,000 tons, well in excess of maximum present imports, would serve to reestablish equilibrium and forestall what now looms as an inevitable decline in the domestic industry.

FORCING THE AMERICAN FARMER TO COMPETE WITH TROPICAL LABOR

On July 19, 1897, Chairman Dingley, of the Committee on Ways and Means, said on the floor of Congress:

> I believe that the time has come when the production of our own sugar from the beet ought to be and can be successfully entered upon, and thus the $75,000,000—soon to be $100,000,000—sent abroad for the purchase of our sugar ultimately distributed here to our farmers.

In fulfillment of Mr. Dingley's utterance, which, indorsed by Congress, fostered the great beet-sugar industry of America, farmers received in 1927 over $55,000,000 for their sugar beets alone. Other benefits from livestock operations and improved yields in other crops in rotation with sugar beets equaled the $100,000,000 payment to farmers enunciated in Mr. Dingley's prophecy.

Our Government, since the enactment of the Dingley tariff of 1897, has never contemplated forcing the American farmer into competition with tropical labor 7,000 miles across the Pacific. This competition, however, is inevitable unless Congress restores a limitation on duty-free importation of Philippine sugar.

A sharp contrast exists between the standards of agricultural life in the United States and the Philippines. The American beet grower enjoys a virtual partnership with the manufacturer of sugar. Under the form of contract most widely in use among the 19 beet-growing States of the Union the farmer is guaranteed prior to planting his seed a fixed initial minimum price per ton for his beets, to be paid in cash immediately after harvest.

Over and above this initial guaranteed minimum price per ton, the usual contract provides for additional payments to the farmer on a sliding scale if the sugar content and market price of sugar warrant such increase. In other words, the beet grower can not receive less than the guaranteed cash minimum, but may, and usually does, receive more under certain conditions.

The Department of Agriculture estimated the 1927 beet tonnage in the United States at 7,737,000 tons, and under these participating contracts, averaging over $7 a ton and reaching $8.50 in some localities, the farmer received from his beets alone, as I have stated, over $55,000,000.

What such payments mean to agricultural communities can only be fully realized when it is remembered that only a portion of the farm is devoted in any one year to sugar beets. Sugar cane, like alfalfa, is cut successive years from a single planting, but beets are planted and harvested annually in rotation with other farm crops.

LIMITATION OF PHILIPPINE SUGAR IMPORTS OF BENEFIT TO THE ISLANDS

The restoration of the policy of 1909, placing a limit upon the future importation of Philippine sugar entering the United States, while protecting the domestic sugar industry would work no hardship on Philippine sugar producers now operating in the islands. On the other hand, it would prevent the islands from becoming entirely dependent on a single competitive export crop and stimulate the universally accepted principle of crop diversification, long advocated by the Department of Agriculture and recognized by economists as essential to economic, cultural, and political progress.

For the Philippine Islands to become more and more dependent on a single, competitive export crop, artificially stimulated to tremendous production by an unlimited duty-free market in the United States, would delay economic, political, and cultural development of the Philippine people. Such an abnormal growth would be contrary to the accepted principles of diversified agriculture, on which balanced prosperity depends.

Governor General Stimson on his recent arrival in the Philippines, while he quite naturally stated that he was "opposed to anything which could possibly restrict the agricultural development of the Philippines," said:

> The islands are capable of producing many farm products now unknown here, and I intend to encourage diversified farming and give the people the varied interests which I believe will result in enhanced prosperity.

The diversification of agricultural production, the need of which the new Governor General so clearly recognizes, will be greatly stimulated if the Philippine people are reminded that they can not reasonably expect a duty-free market in the United States for an unlimited production of sugar. The free importation of 500,000 tons, which my resolution contemplates, relieves the Philippines from the payment of duty in a sum amounting to about $22,000,000 annually.

Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, was apprehensive of the present disturbed condition in 1926, when after pointing out the ultimate danger to the insular people of flooding the United States with cheaply produced duty-free sugar he said:

> The land on which sugar cane is now being grown can be utilized for other products with profit to the producer.

The adoption of the proposed resolution would not necessitate the abandonment of the sugar production on the lands now being utilized in the Philippines for that purpose but would suggest the wisdom of devoting new areas brought into cultivation to the production of other and particularly noncompetitive agricultural products.

It is believed that the national welfare of the Philippines will be best served by the utilization of their vast uncultivated tracts for the production of such noncompetitive commodities as rubber, fibrous plants, and coffee, rather than sugar, citrus fruits, and other crops grown in large quantities by American farmers and upon which the agricultural prosperity of many States largely depends.

The Sixty-seventh Congress wisely directed an investigation by the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture of the possibilities of rubber production in the Philippines. According to the report of this commission, published in 1925, more than 1,500,000 acres on the islands of Mindano, Basilan, and Jolo were suitable for para rubber plantations. Plentiful labor for the project was found to be available.

It seems extremely unwise for such undeveloped territory to go into sugar production, as is the present tendency, in the light of the advantages to the islands which would be realized through promotion of crop diversification. According to the Philippine Bureau of Agriculture there are under cultivation only about 14,320 square miles, or 12½ per cent of the total land area. It has frequently been predicted that the Philippines, like Cuba, which doubled her production of sugar in 10 years, might eventually produce 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 tons of sugar annually. Manifestly no such production should be encouraged on the theory of a duty-free American market. The climate, soil, and cheap tropical labor conditions are similar in many respects to the island of Java, one of the greatest sugar-producing areas in the world.

DANGER OF REMOTE SUGAR SUPPLY

In the history of Europe are events centering on the sugar beet, worth reviewing in light of the Philippine sugar problem.

The modern beet-sugar industry was literally born in the cradle of war. After years of experimental work by random investigators came Napoleon's famous decree of 1811 appropriating a million francs to be used in establishing sugar schools and extending concessions to farmers and manufacturers. By 1813, when France, blockaded by her enemies, was unable to secure sugar from remote sources, 334 small beet-sugar factories were in operation in France.

From this period dates the growth of the great beet-sugar industry in Europe, now functioning in 17 countries as one of the major sources of food for man and beast and contributing in 1927 over 8,000,000 tons of sugar or one-third of the world's supply.

Germany leads the nations of Europe with 1,665,000 tons of sugar in 1927. Then comes Russia and the Ukraine with 1,500,000 tons, and Czechoslovakia with 1,265,000. France, with 870,000 tons, falls only a little short of the beet-sugar output in the United States.

Out of Napoleon's desire to make France independent of foreign supplies of sugar, Germany learned a great lesson of sugar economy, which now makes her the greatest beet-sugar country of Europe.

How far German's ability to produce her own sugar, one of the three great human food requirements, contributed to her amazing stamina during the war, it is difficult to estimate.

It is an ironical gesture of history that England forced Napoleon to grow sugar beets, that France taught Germany, and that Germany later should supply England with much of her sugar. Loss of German sugar during the war was a grave matter to England—so grave, in fact, that since the war England has heavily subsidized a domestic beet-sugar industry, and now has a dozen factories in operation in the hope that never again shall she be caught short of sugar. It is said sugar beets are now growing on the private estates of King George.

It would be the height of folly for the United States to build up a tremendous sugar industry across the Pacific at the expense of the domestic industry, and become largely dependent on that supply. To do so would result in wiping out a quarter century's progress by the American farmer and eventually sacrificing an investment in the beet-sugar industry of $225,000,000. To do so would be to disregard entirely what, to the nations of Europe, has long been an established principle essential to economic security.

NO GENERAL TARIFF REVISION REQUIRED

Restoring the policy of 1909 is not a tariff problem in the familiar sense. It proposes no revision of the present tariff, nor a tariff on Philippine sugar in the amounts now entering the United States. The question resolves itself into whether it shall henceforth be the policy of our Government to produce sugar in the United States or to transfer this encouragement and stimulation to an industry 7,000 miles across the Pacific at the gateway of China and under the shadow of Japan.

DOMESTIC BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY SHOULD BE FOSTERED AND ENCOURAGED

Since 1897, with the adoption of the Dingley Tariff Act, we have deemed it necessary to foster the development of a sugar industry within the continental limits of the United States, which to-day contributes over 1,000,000 tons to the Nation's needs, and pays the American farmer over $55,000,000 annually for his sugar beets, not to mention added millions received through the feeding of by-products to cattle and the stimulation of other crops in rotation with the beet.

Since 1897, as I have stated, we have fostered the domestic sugar industry. Since 1921 we have begun, without realizing it, to discourage the domestic industry in favor of the Philippine industry. The time has come, not to make a choice between them, but to establish an equilibrium satisfactory to both.

To-day there are over 100 beet-sugar factories in 19 States of the Union, but in 1927 only 84 were in operation. In recent years earnings have been low; failures in many cases are now imminent. Many factories have closed; others have been forced to move to more favorable locations. Two years ago Louisiana's total cane-sugar output was less than the single production of one of the larger western beet-sugar factories. To-day, only by valiant effort, is our cane-sugar industry of the South getting back on its feet. The introduction of new varieties of disease-resisting cane, together with greater mechanical efficiency in manufacturing, are giving hope to Louisiana.

Fundamentally responsible for the present plight of the domestic industry is the dislocation of the world sugar industry during the war. Overexpansion of sugar production in tropical countries outside of the war zone, and inability of those tropical countries to return to equilibrium with reference to the revival of Europe's great beet-sugar industry, have played havoc with the domestic industry.

THE AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY OF THE SUGAR BEET

The difficulty encountered in interesting the American farmer in the sugar beet a quarter of a century ago has always seemed incomprehensible to European visitors. The statement of a German agronomist, "In Europe we have to grow the sugar beet," has since become a classic epitome of the beet's importance in agriculture and livestock operations.

American farmers are now coming to realize that by rotating sugar beets with cereal and other crops the acreage yield of the latter is increased from 50 to 100 per cent.

At present in the United States the total cultivated area devoted to sugar beets is still so relatively small as compared to other crops that the effect of beet culture on stimulating other crop yields is not appreciated by the general public as widely as in Europe.

In Europe, where large areas are devoted to beet culture, the result is shown to a marked degree. This is illustrated in the following table showing the average yield of certain crops in 1913 in seven northwestern beet-growing countries of Europe and in the United States taken as a whole:

Average yield per acre

	Northwestern Europe	United States
	Bushels	Bushels
Wheat	24.7	15.2
Rye	28.4	16.2
Barley	36.2	23.8
Oats	47.7	29.2
Potatoes	210.7	80.4

European agronomists and economists are unanimous in attributing their large acreage yields to the fact that their farmers rotate cereal and other crops with sugar beets and other hoed crops, one year in four.

Sugar beets have an outstanding economic value from a marketing standpoint as compared to wheat, potatoes, and other bulky crops. In shipping these latter crops, the entire bulk has to bear the expense of the long haul to the market or else be converted into livestock products and shipped to the market. But a large part of the food consumed by an animal is utilized to maintain the animal during the fattening period.

It is estimated that it takes 500 to 1,000 pounds of hay and grain to produce a gain of 100 pounds of livestock.

On the other hand an acre of sugar beets produces not only 2,500 pounds of pure white granulated sugar, 100 per cent of which is digestible as human food, but also the by-products from an acre of beets, properly fed to livestock in a balanced ration, will produce 300 pounds of meat.

These by-products are beet tops, beet pulp, and molasses. W. D. Lippitt, general manager of the Great Western Sugar Co., testified as follows before the Senate Finance Committee in 1921:

> The by-products alone of an acre of sugar beets will produce as much human food in the form of meat as will the entire product of an acre of corn. I regard as quite conservative the estimate that the by-products of an acre of sugar beets will properly handled produce 300 pounds of beef or mutton. Using this as a basis it will be apparent that in addition to the output of 1,000,000 tons of sugar each year the industry should be credited with an annual contribution to the national food supply of 240,000,000 pounds of meat products.

The encouragement of the growth of sugar beets and sugar cane is not only important and essential to the prosperity of agriculture in many localities over a wide area of our country, and the domestic production of sugar is not only of tremendous importance in stabilizing prices and maintaining our position of economic independence in time of peace but the maintenance and increase of this production is of vital importance should we unhappily be confronted with war conditions. These considerations, particularly the latter, are very clearly set out in an editorial in the Washington Post, Sunday, March 11, 1928, which is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sunday, March 11, 1928]

WAR AND NO SUGAR

Governor General Stimson, upon his arrival at Manila, has stated that he is "opposed to anything which could possibly restrict the agricultural development of the Philippines." He had reference to the proposal to restrict to 500,000 tons annually the free importation of Philippine sugar into the United States. But he added that "the islands are capable of producing many farm products now unknown here, and I intend to encourage diversified farming and give the people the varied interests which I believe will result in enhanced prosperity, eventually making possible industrialization."

The enormous profit in sugar making, made possible by free entry of the product into the American market, has a tendency to confine the Philippines to a single product. This is not a healthy tendency, either for the Philippines or for the United States. At the rate of increased production of sugar it will not be many years before the United States will be dependent upon Philippine sugar. It is driving out its competitors, including domestic beet sugar, Hawaiian cane sugar, and Cuban cane sugar. Thus, unless the tendency to overproduce this single crop in the Philippines is checked, the United States will find itself compelled in case of war to guard a 7,000-mile avenue through which to procure a necessity of life.

The authorities charged with the duty of planning for the defense of the United States are doing their utmost to make this country self-sustaining. They are laying out methods for developing chemicals, metals, minerals, woods, and other raw materials so that when war comes the United States will not be cut off from its necessary supplies. In the meantime, through a mistaken policy of excessive generosity toward the Philippines, Congress is destroying the domestic and nearby sources of sugar, which is as indispensable as any war material.

Congress should make a liberal allowance for the production of Philippine sugar by permitting its importation free of duty, but beyond a certain point a duty should be imposed. The limit commonly deemed to be just to all concerned is 500,000 tons a year. The islands are not exporting that quantity to the United States at present, but they are rapidly increasing their output, at the expense of producers in the United States, Hawaii, and Cuba. Governor Stimson's plans for diversification of production in the islands will fail so long as sugar is admitted free into the United States in unlimited quantities. A large quota of the Navy will be needed to protect this commerce in time of war, whether the United States be a neutral or a belligerent.

It is not prudent to create such a state of affairs, as a matter of self-defense, and it is not conducive to prosperity in the Philippines to make the people dependent upon a single crop. Congress should impose a reasonable limitation upon the free entry of Philippine sugar.

In conclusion I wish to add that the passage of this proposed resolution will carry out the original intent of the Congress to protect the American sugar-beet farmer from the cheaply produced sugar of the Philippine Islands; will prevent those islands from becoming a one-crop country, a condition which is economically unsound; will stimulate the production of sugar within continental United States, and thereby annually distribute to American labor, industry, and agriculture hundreds of millions of dollars which we are now sending abroad for a necessary food commodity which we have every facility for producing at home. [Applause.]

Mr. GUEVARA. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield for a question?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GUEVARA. The gentleman from Colorado is aware of the fact there is free trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. There is free trade, with certain exceptions that have been made.

Mr. GUEVARA. And while the United States can send her products to the Philippine Islands duty free, does the gentleman from Colorado believe it would be fair that the Philippine Islands should be limited as to the products they can send to the United States?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The gentleman will admit that his country has not yet arrived at the status of a State, will he not?

Mr. GUEVARA. But we are under the American flag.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes; you are under the American flag as one of our dependencies.

Mr. GUEVARA. May I again ask the gentleman from Colorado if he believes it is fair to allow the United States to send any of its products to the Philippine Islands without any limitation whatever while the Philippine Islands are to be limited in the sending of their products to the United States.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I have endeavored to be very liberal with respect to the Philippine situation, and I believe it is to their advantage, in the event they should ever become independent—which is the hope, I presume, of the gentleman—because the Philippine Islands would then be deprived of any duty-free market in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. GUEVARA].

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] has submitted to the consideration of this committee a very important question, and one which affects our present political relationship. I may agree with the gentleman from Colorado that perhaps the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands is a menace to the sugar industry of this country, and may I suggest that the best remedy is to get rid of the Philippine Islands, and we are now ready to be gotten rid of by the United States.

I believe it is unfair to suggest any proposition limiting the exportations of the Philippines to the United States while the United States is free to export to the Philippine Islands any amount of products produced in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a statement issued by me on March 6, 1928, on the Timberlake resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from the Philippines?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

MARCH 6, 1928.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE, of Colorado, has introduced a joint resolution providing that hereafter only 500,000 tons of Philippine sugar per annum may be introduced into the United States free of duty.

Following, as it does, certain allegations of representatives of the Cuban sugar producers and a resolution of the American Beet Sugar Association, the origin of the joint resolution may not unfairly be attributed to this source, or, at least, to the facts alleged by these sources.

From Cuban sources it was alleged that the admission of Philippine sugar free into the United States was a violation of the trade convention between the United States and Cuba. This admits of the simple answer that it is not true. The history of the trade convention with Cuba and of the legislation admitting Philippine sugar into the United States first with a reduction of the duty imposed on foreign sugars and then free of duty to the extent of 300,000 tons and then free of duty without limit makes this perfectly clear.

The present legislation governing the admission of Philippine products into the United States free of duty was enacted after a long discussion of the subject, and at no time during this discussion, extending over 13 years, was it alleged that it in any way violated the trade convention with Cuba. The reasons given by Mr. TIMBERLAKE in the preamble of his resolution do not include a reference to the Cuban convention, so it is believed that that point may be dismissed.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE, in the preamble to his resolution, cites reasons justifying the resolution. In their order they are:

"Whereas the encouragement and protection of the growth of the sugar beet and sugar cane in the United States, and of the production of beet and cane sugar in the interest of agriculture and as a measure of economic stability and defense, has long been an important feature of our tariff policy; and

"Whereas a continuation of such policy is highly important from the standpoint of agriculture and as a defense against the dangers inherent in a condition of dependence on foreign supplies of sugar."

This is a recitation of an American policy embodied in the tariff legislation of Congress. As Filipinos, and speaking for the Filipino people, we can find no fault with this. To-day there is a duty of approximately 2¼ cents a pound on sugar entering the United States from foreign countries, which, in the case of Cuba, is, by a trade convention with the United States, reduced by 20 per cent. This means for practical purposes that the domestic producer of sugar is protected by a duty of 1⅞ cents, for the reason that practically all of the foreign sugar consumed in the American market comes from Cuba.

Obviously, with this duty and the actual situation of sugar in the United States market, the domestic producer gets the full benefit of this tariff. In the year 1927, in order to supply the American market with its demand for sugar, it was necessary to bring into the United States sugar in the stated amounts from the following sources:

	Pounds
Hawaii	1,553,071,332
Porto Rico	1,148,127,293
Philippine Islands and Virgin Islands	1,072,714,991
A total of sugar from sources exterior to the continental United States under the American flag	3,773,913,616
From Cuba	7,294,109,258

From other sources the amounts were trifling.

The estimated production of sugar in the continental United States was as follows:

	Pounds
Beet	1,260,400,000
Cane	94,330,000

From the foregoing it is obvious, first, that the domestic sugar grown in the continental United States meets but one-ninth of the demand of the American market; that the total sugar grown under the American flag meets but five-twelfths of the demand of the American market.

Obviously, so long as a great part of the sugar consumed in the United States must come from foreign sources, no reason exists, because of the sugar situation, to discourage the production of sugar under the American flag. The producer of sugar in the United States can in no way profit by the limitation on the amount of sugar from the Philippine Islands that will come in free of duty into the United States unless the sugar from that source approximately fills the void in the American market left by other domestic producers. Under the present situation and under a situation which would continue, though the production in the Philippines were materially increased, the domestic producer will continue to receive for his sugar the world price of Cuban sugar, plus 1¾ cents a pound.

"Whereas the Congress, in the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act of 1909, which gave duty-free entry into our ports to most Philippine products, recognized the danger to the stability and growth of the domestic production of sugar in an unlimited duty-free importation of sugar from a tropical region with cheap labor and practically unlimited areas favorable to the growth of sugar cane, and limited the duty-free importation of Philippine sugar to a maximum of 300,000 tons per annum, although less than 40,000 tons of Philippine sugar was imported into the United States in 1909; and

"Whereas under this limitation and up to the time of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 the importation of Philippine sugar had never reached 200,000 long tons per annum, and had averaged less than 115,000 long tons per annum, and therefore the continuation of the limitation did not appear necessary or esesntial; and

"Whereas the importation of Philippine sugar has increased from 147,212 long tons in 1921 to 473,674 long tons in 1927, being an increase of over 220 per cent."

The United States Yearbook of Agriculture for 1926 gives the following pertinent information on the subject of sugar available for consumption in continental United States from 1909 to 1926:

Year beginning July 1	Imports as sugar	Brought in from insular possessions	Production
Average:	Short tons	Short tons	Short tons
1909–1913	2,068,427	1,004,493	957,491
1914–1920	2,847,575	1,072,288	1,102,153
1921–1925	3,854,633	1,495,517	1,187,693

The outstanding and obvious inference from this table is that the United States has, even considering its production of sugar in the insular possessions, become more and more dependent on sugar from foreign sources.

The next justifying reason is the following:

"Whereas the privilege of an unlimited duty-free market for Philippine sugar in the United States tends to delay the further logical development by the Philippine people of their local oriental-sugar markets and to make them largely dependent upon a single competitive export crop, contrary to the principles of diversified agriculture and industry upon which depend ultimate economic, cultural, and political progress."

The oriental-sugar market of the Philippines has always been China. It is quite unreasonable, under existing conditions, to expect the Philippines to develop a sugar market in China. With the cessation of the present troubled conditions in China, doubtless a part of the Philippine sugar product will find its market there, as in the past, but it is not desired to depart too far from the theme that all of the sugar produced in the Philippine Islands entering free of duty the American market in no way prejudices the domestic producer of sugar within the continental United States.

Now, as to the single export crop, what are the facts? We get our sugar not produced in the continental United States from the following sources:

Cuba: Sugar constitutes 80 per cent of the export crop of Cuba.

Porto Rico: Sugar constitutes 50 per cent of the export crop of Porto Rico.

Hawaii: Sugar constitutes 60 per cent of the export crop of Hawaii.

Philippine Islands: Sugar constitutes 30 per cent at most of the export crop of the Philippine Islands.

In the Philippine Islands, different from any of these external sources of sugar, there have been the most strenuous efforts made to produce foodstuffs locally. In 1903 rice constituted 37 per cent of the total imports in the Philippine Islands, in 1926 it constituted 4 per cent, and in 1927 it was barely 1 per cent of the imports.

In other words, sugar has by no means the same prominence in the Philippines that it has in Cuba, Porto Rico, or Hawaii. The production is far less per capita.

Then follows the following:

"Whereas the unlimited and constantly increasing duty-free importation of Philippine sugar into the United States constitutes a grave menace to the continuation of the domestic sugar industry."

It is believed that it has been made clear that the bringing into the United States of Philippine sugar free of duty is no menace to the domestic producer of sugar. The domestic sugar industry produces but a fractional part of the sugar consumed in the United States, and the sugar at present brought in from the Philippine Islands means, at most, the curtailment of the rather rapid increase in the importation into the United States of Cuban sugar.

"Whereas there is no purpose or disposition to deprive the sugar producers of the Philippines of our free market to the extent to which they have heretofore enjoyed it, but rather to protect the American beet and cane farmers and sugar producers from an indefinite increase of duty-free importations imperilling the existence of the domestic sugar industry."

The foregoing table from the Yearbook of Agriculture makes clear that the domestic producers of sugar, including the Philippines, fail to meet the domestic demand of the United States by an increasing quantity and not a decreasing quantity. It is necessary to-day for the United States to import from purely foreign sources more sugar to meet the domestic demand than it imported from such sources at any time in the past. Certainly, therefore, there is no present encroachment on the field of the domestic sugar producers by sugar from the Philippine Islands.

The likelihood of an indefinite or early increase of Philippine sugar is best obtained by a study of sugar production in the Philippine Islands.

In the last four normal years of Spanish control of the Philippine Islands—1892 to 1895—the average annual export of sugar from the Philippine Islands was 266,610 metric tons. In the last four years of which there are available completed records—1923 to 1926—the average annual exportation of sugar from the Philippines was 396,969 tons. That is, within this period the sugar exported from the Philippine Islands has increased by but a fractional part of the relative increase from Porto Rico, Hawaii, or Cuba. Not only this, but the increased production in the Philippines has been ridiculously small as compared with increased production in Java or Formosa, territories receiving no benefit from the American tariff. The sugar industry in the Philippine Islands is an old industry, and the recent increase of production and of exportation is due almost entirely to improved mills and to improved agricultural methods.

But one mill has been erected in the Philippine Islands to produce sugar from cane grown on territory not previously cultivated. This mill has so far proven unprofitable, though it has been in operation approximately 15 years.

Briefly, it is necessary now to import more sugar from purely foreign sources to supply the American market than at any time since the extension of American sovereignty to the Philippines. The increase of production in the Philippine Islands during this period has been much slower, notwithstanding the stimulus of the American market, than it has been in the other sugar-producing countries supplying the American market.

The present trade relations with the Philippine Islands were established by Congress after most careful study of the entire subject and are substantially embodied in the following provisions of the tariff act of 1922:

"All articles, the growth or product of or manufactured in the Philippine Islands from materials the growth or product of the Philippine Islands or of the United States, or of both, or which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per cent of their total value * * * coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty: Provided, however, That in consideration of the exemptions aforesaid, all articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States * * * shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty."

Obviously, this is, and is intended to be, a reciprocal provision. Congress, however, has in the organic law of the Philippine Islands provided that "the trade relations between the islands and the United States shall continue to be governed exclusively by laws of the Congress of the United States."

We do not doubt that Congress, having reserved to itself this power, will see to it that the power is exercised for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands and will withdraw no privileges upon which the prosperity of the islands so largely depends, without most serious study. A study of the subject leads to but one conclusion, and that is that the present and prospective development of the sugar industry of the Philippine Islands offers not the slightest threat to the domestic industry in the United States.

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner to the United States from the Philippines.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have received a letter, two letters in fact, I think similar to those that many Members of this House have received, from a paper published in Washington, called the National Tribune, with a large, elegant letterhead, a reference to the Stars and Stripes, and the widows and orphans, and so on.

In the letter is a request for the filing of petitions by residents of my district and elsewhere in behalf of legislation for Civil War pensions.

The matter of the attitude of this publication has been before the House previously and possibly there is no use of exploiting the publication any further. I investigated their methods of soliciting subscriptions last year through the Post Office Department to see whether or not they were in fact beyond the pale of the law. They certainly are not within the law from a moral viewpoint regardless of the phraseology and language of the law with respect to using the mails for deceptive purposes.

I have answered the circular letter sent to me, as I suppose many others have been sent, and I desire to read both my reply to the signers of the petitions and my reply to the publication itself, because I think that such deception practiced on many of the susceptible veterans of the Civil War, their widows and orphans, should be exposed, and if one attempt is not successful we should keep up the game. [Applause.]

I am opposed to any publication that sends out, under the cloak of aiding the veterans' widows and orphans, requests for subscriptions and purchases of 7 per cent stock in a company at $1 per share. [Applause.] The nature of the publication and the method of deception is so apparent that we can not be too harsh in our treatment of it.

Now, I want to read the letters, and first I read the one to the first signer of one of the petitions. It is as follows:

MARCH 21, 1928.

Mr. JASON ALLEN,
82 Stoddard Avenue, Pittsfield, Mass.

MY DEAR MR. ALLEN: The National Tribune has forwarded to me a petition signed by yourself and several others, urging the enactment of pension-increase legislation. The House of Representatives recently passed a bill increasing to $40 per month the pensions of Civil War widows who married their soldier husbands after the close of the war and before June 27, 1905. The bill is now before the Senate for consideration. In this connection I might state that the National Tribune has no standing with Congress and no influence with Members thereof. Its main object is to collect subscriptions for the publication and for stock therein from veterans and widows who can ill afford to pay for the same. You may be assured that Members of Congress are anxious to do everything reasonably possible for the veterans and their widows, and whatever they feel they can consistently do will be done without the necessity of anyone subscribing to the National Tribune.

Assuring you of my interest, and with best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

Here is my letter to the president of the National Tribune:

MARCH 22, 1928.

Mr. RICE W. MEANS,
President the National Tribune, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of two circular letters sent by you as president of the National Tribune, inclosing petitions from various citizens, some of whom reside in my district and some in the State of New York.

In filing these memoranda received through you I shall also place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD copies of my letters to the first signers of each petition as well as a copy of this letter to you. I am frank to say that I am in no way in sympathy with the methods of the National Tribune. In my opinion your motives are not as disinterested as you would have them appear. You are seeking only subscriptions and sales of stock. As one Member of Congress I do not need any assistance from a publication which is trying to live on the veterans or their widows and orphans. My sympathy and my vote will be given to their cause, not through your efforts but in spite of them. I should prefer not to have any other papers sent me from your office. If residents of my district desire to communicate with me upon the subject of pension legislation or upon any other subject, I am always delighted to hear from them and to be of service, but I shall not be a party to a subscription and stock-sales propaganda.

Very truly yours,

ALLEN T. TREADWAY.

Now, that covers the whole story.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I am very glad the gentleman has brought this up on the floor of the House. I have had several letters and have answered them in practically the same tone as has the gentleman from Massachusetts. I told my people that they did not need to subscribe for the Tribune or take any stock in it in order to have their matters properly presented to Congress; that if they would correspond with their regular Member he would do everything in his power to look after their interests.

Mr. TREADWAY. The trouble is that this publication is so persistent in its efforts to live on the veterans and their widows that a little exposure like this is not going to accomplish a great deal of good, but I do think it is our duty to notify our constituents as to the proper means of getting legislation, which is not through the purchase of cheap stocks, not through such scare-head petitions as this. This petition which I am going to drop in the basket has a picture at the head of it of a coffin ready to be lowered into the grave with other monuments around, and if that is a good type of stock solicitation I, for one, do not want to subscribe for any such stock, and I hope no constituent of mine will do so.

Mr. SNELL. That represents where the stock is going. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. It represents where the money of the subscriber is going.

Mr. CLAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. CLAGUE. Will the gentleman tell us who is back of this Tribune?

Mr. TREADWAY. Here are the names according to the official letterhead—Rice W. Means, president; John Lewis Smith, secretary; D. L. Rice, treasurer; vice presidents, John McElroy, John L. Clem, W. L. Mattocks.

The letterhead is:

The National Tribune, the Stars and Stripes, Washington, D. C. "To care for him who has borne the battle and for his widow and orphans." (Abraham Lincoln.)

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I can not permit the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] to go without making some comment on it. I believe that the people of America have a fundamental right to petition this legislative body and any other legislative body. Personally, I know many veterans of many wars who subscribe to the publication called the National Tribune and who receive a great deal of satisfaction in reading the articles and editorials therein.

If it were not for crystallization of sentiment by organizations and the press in America the veterans of the Nation's wars, their dependents, and widows and orphans would not have adequate compensation and pensions.

Not very long ago a pension bill was vetoed in the name of economy. We had millions and millions to give to foreign governments on debt settlements, but we did not have sufficient funds to grant a meager increase to the aged widows of Civil War veterans.

The gentleman whose name was just mentioned as president of the National Tribune, Mr. Rice W. Means, was formerly a Senator of the United States. He was recently the commander of the United Spanish War Veterans' national organization, and he is a man of high character who has an interest not only in the welfare of his comrades of the Spanish-American War, but also in the veterans of the Nation's other wars, their widows, orphans, and dependents. I have had no opportunity carefully to examine all of the material that was read into this RECORD, but I could not let the occasion pass without stating that I resent the inference as to the character and purposes of this former United States Senator and former national commander of the United Spanish-American War Veterans, who has served this Nation in time of war as well as in time of peace. I know that the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts regarding the National Tribune will not cause the veterans, widows, and dependents to cancel their subscriptions and stop the paper from coming to their doors.

I sincerely hope that the leaders of this House will make it possible at this session for full discussion of and amendment to legislation to take care of the disabled veterans of the World War. Several sessions ago the World War Veterans Committee was created, and yet that committee has not had a calendar day for consideration of its bills by the House. Legislation from the World War Veterans' Committee has come up under suspension of the rules and has been passed here with only 20 minutes of debate on a side and without opportunity to amend.

Mr. GASQUE. And does the gentleman not know that all of the World War veterans' legislation or pension bills since this administration has been in power have been brought before the House under suspension of the rules.

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes, nearly all of such legislation has been under suspension of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I am going to talk on a matter of historic importance, which should be a very interesting subject to the House and also to the country at large.

One of the most interesting and historical spots in the city of Washington is the Congressional Cemetery. While the United States owns a large part of this sacred ground and many deceased Senators and Representatives and other dignitaries of the Government who died in Washington during their term of office lie buried there, yet there is no care or supervision on the part of the Government over this city of the dead and graves and monuments are being sadly neglected.

This situation was called to my attention by the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution and at the instance of Mrs. Edwin C. Gregory, the national legislative chairman. I have introduced a bill (H. R. 11916) authorizing the Secretary of War to care for and preserve the land and monuments and care for that part of this cemetery owned by the United States and to preserve and to beautify graves and monuments of the distinguished dead who died while in the service of our Government. Mrs. Gregory and Mrs. A. S. Brosseau, the president general of the Daughters of the American Revolution, are to be highly commended for their efforts and interest in this undertaking. This patriotic move on their part will receive the commendation and thanks of not only the Congress, but of the country as well.

It was in 1807 Christ Episcopal Church first established this burying ground. It was chosen as the burying ground for Senators and Representatives who died in office.

Many years have passed since Congress abandoned the plan of concentrating its official dead in this cemetery. The cemetery is still used by the Washington parish and many handsome memorials are there erected which makes such a sharp contrast to the crumbling tombs and uncared-for monuments and cenotaphs erected to mark the resting places of the official dead.

The cemetery lies about a mile east of the Capitol, situated on the north bank of the Anacostia River, just above Pennsylvania Avenue, and extending from Seventeenth Street east to the river.

A most interesting article by Nelson McDowell Shepard in the Daughters of the American Revolution magazine has this to say:

CENOTAPHS AND EPITAPHS IN CONGRESSIONAL CEMETERY

By Nelson McDowell Shepard

The burying ground of the century-old Christ Church, known nationally as Congressional Cemetery, is rich in the interest its holds for students of the Revolutionary and succeeding periods of American history. The cemetery lies off frequented paths, yet is easily accessible to visitors in Washington, the National Capital. Its sloping greensward gives an unexpected bit of Old World calmness to a medley of river flats and drab streets scarcely a mile east of the Capitol. At the foot of the slope the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River winds along, while quaint walks, stately cedars, and heavily scrolled gravestones transform the upper shore into an interesting, historic spot.

In these surroundings are to be found the only group of cenotaphs—a memorial customary in Europe—ever erected by the United States Government in honor of deceased Senators and Representatives. The strict usage of the cenotaph, however, is not adhered to in every case, for beneath the bleak, gray sandstones lie the bodies of many Members of Congress and other dignitaries of the Government who died in Washington during their term of office.

Unlike the usual ornamental cenotaphs in memory of European statesmen, the American cenotaph is so forbidding in appearance that the venerable Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, once declared on the floor of the House of Representatives, in which he was then serving, that the thought of being buried beneath one of them added a new terror to death. Other Members evidently agreed with him, as in 1876 Congress refused to appropriate money for the erection of more cenotaphs unless differently designed.

Nearly a century ago Christ Church burying ground was chosen as the resting place for Senators and Representatives who died in office. Later this custom was extended so as to include the burial of other public officers, with a result that the cemetery for years enjoyed a semi-official character and it became generally known as Congressional Cemetery.

Many years have passed since Congress abandoned its plan of concentrating its official dead in one place. The cemetery, however, is still used by the members of Washington Parish, the handsome modern memorials being in sharp contrast to the crumbling relics of an interesting congressional ruling.

It is said that more patriots whose names are linked with the early periods of our history are buried along this river slope, perhaps, than in any other single cemetery in the country. Two Vice Presidents of the United States, one of them a signer of the Declaration of Independence, have been buried there. Private soldiers and those in high command of the Continental Army sleep side by side in the democracy of death. Statesmen of colonial times, members of the Cabinet, of the United States Supreme Court, and of the Congress repose beneath stately monuments and somber cenotaphs, weather stained and moss covered by passing years.

The history of Christ Church leading up to the establishment of the cemetery in April, 1807, is set in the days when the now beautiful Capital of the Nation was a tract of swamps and country lanes. Before the plans for the National Capital were conceived, a tobacco barn on what was later to be a busy street in Washington, afforded a place of worship for adherents of the Episcopal faith. Thomas Jefferson and George Washington, it is recorded by trustworthy authorities, frequently attended Sabbath services there when traveling through its parish. After the founding of the present seat of government, the Washington Parish was organized and the present edifice, known as Christ Church, still standing on its original site, was dedicated in 1808.

Those were the palmy days of the little parish. It became the custom as well as the fashion for the élite of the Capital to attend its Sabbath services. The beloved Lafayette, on his visits to Washington, and the brilliant Alexander Hamilton frequently worshiped under its roof. The vestry reserved a pew for the exclusive use of Presidents of the United States and their families. For this reason the place of worship became known as "the church of state," a designation which it finally yielded to others when the drifting tide of the city gradually left it on the outskirts of fashionable Washington. But during its halcyon days Madison, Jefferson, and Monroe were among the early Chief Executives who most frequently occupied the "President's pew."

With this historic background it is natural enough that Congress should have selected the burying ground of Christ Church as the resting place for Senators and Representatives who should die in office. It is interesting, too, in these days of high living costs and reckless public expenditures to know that the idea of a special cemetery for Government officials was abandoned because of the growing expense involved.

From the time the first cenotaph was erected by the Government over the grave of Senator Uriah Tracy in 1807 until 1876 the same pattern was followed for each stone. Just who selected the form of these monuments early records do not indicate. But the custom of placing cenotaphs in memory of Members of the lower House originated with the monument placed for James Lent, Representative from New York, who died February 22, 1833.

According to the register of graves, 109 interments of Government officials have been made in Congressional Cemetery. Monuments have been erected over 100 of these graves. In addition 85 cenotaphs have been placed in honor of Members of Congress who are buried in other cemeteries. Among these latter are cenotaphs bearing the names of John C. Calhoun, the great "nullifier," and Henry Clay, the "compromiser." Grouped together in even rows in a conspicuous section of the grounds, these funereal monuments at once arouse curiosity.

The cenotaphs are uniform in material and design. Fashioned from sandstone on a base about 5 feet square, upon which is placed a base about 3 feet high; they are surmounted by a rounded top reaching to a broad height of about 5 feet above the ground. With few exceptions, each monument bears upon it the following inscription:

"The Honorable ———, a Member of Congress of the United States from the State of ——— (or in case of a Senator it reads—a Senator of the United States from the State of ———). Born ———, died ———."

A number of these cenotaphs still have spaces for names left blank.

Up to 1835 practically every Member of Congress who died in office was buried in Congressional Cemetery. Means of transportation were so limited that few families were able to convey the remains of their dead from the Capital, but as facilities for transportation grew more adequate this practice gradually ceased. By act of May 23, 1876, Congress abolished the custom of erecting cenotaphs, and provided that thereafter monuments should be authorized only when the deceased Member was actually interred in the cemetery.

The names of the Senators buried there, with the date of their death, are taken from the records, as follows: Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, July 19, 1807; Francis Malbone, of Rhode Island, June 4, 1809; James Burrill, jr., of Rhode Island, December 25, 1820; W. A. Trimble, of Ohio, December 13, 1821; William Pinkney, of Maryland, February 25, 1822; James Gaillard, of South Carolina, February 26, 1826; James Noble, of Indiana, February 26, 1831; Nathan Smith (removed), of Connecticut, December 6, 1835; Elias K. Kane (removed), of Illinois, December 11, 1835; John Fairfield, of Maine, December 24, 1847; L. S. Pennybacker (removed), of Virginia, January 12, 1847; N. F. Dixon, of Rhode Island, January 29, 1842; William Upham, of Vermont, January 14, 1853; Lemuel J. Bowden, of Virginia, January 2, 1854; J. Pinckney Henderson, of Texas, June 4, 1858; and William N. Roach (no monument), of North Dakota, September 7, 1902.

Sixty-eight Members of the House of Representatives have been buried beneath the spreading trees of the old cemetery. The first was Ezra Darby, of New Jersey, who died January 28, 1808. Others were Thomas Blount, of North Carolina, who died February 7, 1812; Elijah Brigham, of Massachusetts, February 22, 1816; Richard Stanford, of North Carolina, April 9, 1816; David Walker, of Kentucky, March 1, 1820; Nathaniel Hazard, of Rhode Island, December 17, 1820; John Dawson, of Virginia, March 31, 1814; William Lowndes, of South Carolina, October 12, 1822; James Gillespie, of North Carolina, January 10, 1805 (interred later); W. A. Burwell, of Virginia, February 16, 1821; Daniel Heister, of Maryland, March 8, 1804 (interred later); Thomas Hartley, of Pennsylvania, January 1, 1801 (interred later); David S. Kauffman, of Texas, January 30, 1851; James Jones, of Georgia, January 11, 1801 (interred later); Edward Bradley, of Michigan, August 5, 1842; George Holcomb, of New Jersey, December 4, 1828; James Lent, of New York, February 22, 1833; Richard Manning, of South Carolina, May 1, 1836; T. J. Carter, of Maine, March 14, 1838; Barker Burnell, of Massachusetts, June 15, 1843; John Smiley, of Pennsylvania, December 30, 1812; and Narsworthy Hunter, Territorial Delegate from Mississippi, March 11, 1802.

George Clinton, Vice President of the United States, was first interred in Congressional Cemetery, and years elapsed before the body of this venerable figure of the Revolution, friend of George Washington, and early Governor of New York, was taken to his old home in New York for burial.

Tobias Lear, that faithful private secretary to George Washington and the vigilant "Joseph Tumulty" of the Washington administration, also is buried in this section of the grounds. Close by are the graves of Push-Ma-Ta-Ha, noted Choctaw chief; Scarlet Crow, another famous Indian warrior; Gen. James Jackson, a distinguished Georgian; William Pendleton Barbour, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, who died in 1841; H. Brockholst Livingston, also of the United States Supreme Court; William Wirt, an Attorney General of the United States; and Abel P. Upshur, a former Secretary of State and Secretary of the Navy.

In view of the late "unpleasantness" with the Prussians, it is curious to see also here the grave of Baron Frederick Greuhm, first minister to the United States from Prussia, who died in Washington December 1, 1823. Upon his tombstone is inscribed: "This monument is erected by order of His Majesty Frederick Wilhelm III, King of Prussia." Frederick Wilhelm ruled from 1797 to 1840.

The bodies of nearly a hundred soldiers and seamen of the Revolutionary period, the War of 1812, and a few northern and southern soldiers of the Civil War are also interred in the cemetery.

Pausing before a weather-stained monument of simple design, one reads inscribed thereon the story of one of the most regrettable tragedies of the early American Navy. Beneath the monument, side by side in a single grave, rest the bodies of Capt. Beverley Kennon and Abel Parker Upshur, victims of the explosion of a gun aboard the U. S. frigate Princeton, February 28, 1844. Both natives of Virginia, the two men formed a friendship in early youth that lasted even to the grave.

For many years a touch of romance was added to the cemetery by the grave of Nathan Cilley, a Member of Congress from Maine, of brilliant promise, who fell on the field of honor at Bladensburg, Md., one of the last victims of the duello in this country. The body of Representative Cilley has since been removed to his home in Maine, but the circumstances of his death are still told with the cemetery legends.

The monument over the grave of Push-Ma-Ta-Ha, known as the white man's friend, is similar in design to the congressional cenotaphs and was erected by the councilmen of the Choctaw Tribe. Several lines of its inscription, dignified and simple in the eloquence of the Indian tongue, are taken from the memorial address delivered over the body of the chieftain by John Randolph, of Roanoke.

Push-Ma-Ta-Ha died while in Washington in 1824 on a mission for his tribesmen. His career was one of notable achievement. "Let the big guns be fired over me," were among the dying words of the chief. Whether guns were fired in salute over the body of the old Indian warrior available records do not indicate, but it is highly improbable that the dying wish of "the white man's friend" was denied by Andrew Jackson, with whom he had fought in many campaigns.

The inscription reads:

"Push-Ma-Ta-Ha, a Choctaw chief, lies here. This monument to his memory is erected by his brother chiefs who were associated with him in a delegation from their nation in the year 1824 to the General Government of the United States."

On the other side of the monument may be found these words of John Randolph:

"Push-Ma-Ta-Ha was a warrior of great distinction. He was wise in council, eloquent in an extra degree, and on all occasions and under all circumstances, the white man's friend. He died in Washington on the 24th of December, 1824, of the croup, in the 60th year of his age."

Within a few yards of this unusual memorial is the family burying plot of Tobias Lear and the Hon. Elbridge Gerry, whose great-grandson now occupies a seat in the United States Senate from the State of Rhode Island. The Gerry monument was erected by act of Congress in 1923. The inscription shows nothing to indicate his proud Revolutionary record as a signer of the Declaration of Independence. It also makes no mention of the fact that in 1797 he was one of the envoys sent to establish relations with France. Later Gerry was elected Governor of the State of Massachusetts, and then elevated to the Vice Presidency in 1812.

The inscription reads:

"The tomb of Elbridge Gerry, Vice President of the United States, who died suddenly in this city on his way to the Capitol as President of the Senate, November 23, 1814. Aged 70."

Thus fulfilling his own memorable injunction:

"It is the duty of every citizen, though he may have but one day to live, to devote that day to the good of his country."

Tobias Lear rests beneath a great flat slab of granite, erected over his grave by his "desolate widow," who lies beside him. The inscription on the tombstone, barely legible, sets forth these facts:

"Here lies the remains of Tobias Lear. He was early distinguished as the trusted secretary and friend of the illustrious Washington, and after having served his country with dignity, zeal, and fidelity in many honorable stations, died, accountant of the War Department, 11 October, 1816, age 51. His desolate widow and mourning son have erected this monument to mark the place of his abode in the City of Silence."

His "desolate widow," Frances Dandridge Lear, so her tombstone records, was born November 17, 1779, and died December 2, 1856. She was Lear's third wife and a great-niece of Martha Washington. Although 40 long years elapsed, Frances Lear remained steadfast to the end—a "desolate widow." Other graves in the family plot bear the names of Benjamin Franklin Lear, born March 1, 1792, died October 1, 1832, and "Maria Lear and infant daughter."

Tobias Lear came to his death in 1816 by his own hand. Early records do not state why. On Washington's election as President, Lear was appointed Private Secretary to the President of the United States, and served as such until some time in the latter part of 1794, when he went to Europe. He had a severe illness in 1793–1794—the exact dates are vague—and Bartholomew Dandridge began acting as Secretary to the President in 1793. William Jackson was a secretary from the autumn of 1789, and George Washington Craik did secretarial work for the President. After Lear's return from Europe in the spring of 1795, he did not resume his position as secretary to Washington until 1798, when Washington appointed him his military secretary in the provisional army establishment. Lear was with him in that capacity until Washington's death in 1799.

In the extreme northern end of the cemetery is the grave of Uriah Tracy, United States Senator from Connecticut, who was the first person interred in the old Christ Church burying ground.

The name of Tracy is closely linked with the earliest development of New England. Uriah Tracy was the great-great-grandson of "Lieftenant" Thomas Tracy, who came to this country in 1637, and founded the town of Norwich, Conn. Colonial records show that Tracy served many terms in the State legislature and was one of the leaders among the Federalists. In 1792 he was chosen speaker of the house, and the following year witnessed his promition to the United States House of Representatives, serving until 1796, when he was elected to the Senate. He remained in the United States Senate until his death on July 19, 1807.

During his service in Congress Senator Tracy became one of the leaders of his party, a man of profound statesmanlike ability, and was particularly famed for his rare wit. Upon his death, the Members of the Senate for the first time wore crape about their left arms as a mark of their affection and respect which they held for their colleague.

James Gillespie, a member of Congress from North Carolina, is another whose Revolutionary service is noteworthy. He died January 11, 1805, and his body was transferred from the old Presbyterian Cemetery in Washington and placed in Congressional Cemetery April 14, 1892, with appropriate honors. He was the last Congressman buried there. Gillespie served with distinction in the State convention of 1776 and in the State house of commons from 1779 to 1783. The only mark on his grave reads: "James Gillespie, North Carolina, died January 11, 1805."

A member of the United States Supreme Court buried in Congressional Cemetery is H. Brockholst Livingston, of New York, who died in Washington March 19, 1823. He entered the Revolutionary Army with rank of captain and won the grade of lieutenant colonel.

Gen. Thomas Blount, of North Carolina, is another interesting figure of the Revolution. At the age of 16 he entered the Army and in 1780 became a deputy paymaster general. He was a major in command of a battalion of North Carolina militia at the Battle of Eutaw Springs. He enjoyed a long congressional career, dying February 7, 1812.

The Pennsylvania muster rolls record Henry Black as a private in the York County militia; corporal in the Cumberland County militia, and as a captain in the Bedford County militia. For many years he was a member of Congress from Somerset, Pa. He died November 28, 1841, but was reinterred in Congressional Cemetery the following year.

Hon. Levi Casey, of South Carolina, a brigadier general of militia in the Revolutionary War, also is buried in the cemetery, by reinterment, August 1, 1832. He died in Washington, February 1, 1807.

"Major John Kinney, of New Jersey, an officer of the Army of the Revolution, died in this city July 17, 1832, aged seventy-five years" is the brief inscription carved upon another stone.

Rear Admiral George W. Baird, United States Navy, retired, has prepared a list of men buried in Congressional Cemetery who may have served in the Revolutionary War. More than 135 names are included in the list. Among them are Commodore Campbell, who died in 1823; Maj. Gen. Jacob Brown, buried in 1826; Commander Isaac Chauncey, 1839; Maj. Alexander Forrest, born 1762, died 1834; James John Kenney, 1757–1832; Capt. Peter Lennox, buried 1833; Colonel Morrison, of Kentucky, died 1823; Col. Lemuel William Ruggles, died 1835; Capt. Robert Taylor, died 1831; Tappan Webster, died 1821; Commander Thomas Tingey, born 1750, died 1829; Maj. Moses Young; Joseph Wilson, born 1743, died 1827; Lieut. William Ross, died 1826.

Near the main entrance a tall, majestic column rears itself to the memory of 22 women war workers killed by an explosion in a cartridge factory on the grounds of the Washington Arsenal, now the Army War College, during the Civil War. Close by is the monument to Joseph Lovell, Surgeon General of the Army, born in Boston, December 22, 1788, and who died in Washington, October 17, 1836. It is recorded that in April, 1812, "on the eve of the hostilities with Great Britain, he entered the military service of his country as a surgeon and served with distinction throughout the war." He soon was promoted to the head of the medical department "which, 'til the close of life, he directed, improved, and adorned."

Another distinguished patriot buried in this section of the cemetery grounds is John Forsyth, whose gravestone simply says that he was a "Secretary of State, died October 21, 1841."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is making a very important speech, and it is while we are considering a bill that carries $369,000,000. We have on the floor exactly seven Republicans and a few more Democrats. Would the gentleman like to have a quorum? His speech ought to have a quorum. The idea of debating a bill carrying $369,000,000 with eight Republicans on the floor—one more has now come in——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, the gentleman from North Carolina is talking about a cemetery.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is very apropos just now in so far as the gentleman's administration is concerned. There ought to be an interment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Inasmuch as the gentleman is a candidate for another office, it may be a bad omen for him as well.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, cemeteries are necessary. Men in Biblical days even bargained for the graves they were to lie in. I am just calling attention to the fact that the naval bill carrying $369,000,000 is under discussion, and that my friend from North Carolina is making a splendid speech here, with nobody on the floor to hear it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It is pretty hard for the gentleman from North Carolina to keep the membership here, especially when he is making a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not the gentleman's speech that has emptied the Hall.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I appreciate the interruption, but I would say to the membership of the House that this neglected spot, the Congressional Cemetery, according to the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, is one of the most interesting and historical spots of the Nation. It is neglected; the monuments are crumbling. The graves are unkept. I am not only carrying out a mission of this great society in bringing the matter to the attention of Congress, but a public service as well. I have introduced a bill to the effect that the Secretary of War should take over the governmental part of this cemetery and care for and maintain it.

Now, in my little home town, the town of New Bern, N. C., about a mile from the courthouse, when I ride by there on many occasions I see flying over a little plot of ground the American flag, and I see a house, and the person who guards on behalf of the Government this city of the dead. There are the graves of those who represented the Union forces in the Civil War. And yet within a mile or two miles of this Capitol there are more distinguished dead buried in this Congressional Cemetery than in any other spot, with no care, with no supervision on the part of the Government.

We find that in 1876, with an idea of economy, the Congress of the United States abandoned the task of taking care of this cemetery. Up to that time there was money appropriated for the purpose of taking care of this cemetery.

Now, in order that the Congress may understand just what I am undertaking to do—and it is not only on my motion, but also at the instance of these patriotic women who are going all over the country, led by Mrs. Brosseau and Mrs. Gregory, and others, undertaking to have marked, cared for, and preserved these sacred spots; and to bring it to the attention of the country that our great Nation does appreciate patriotism, that our great Nation does appreciate its honored dead. I felt that we could afford to take enough time in this commercial age, when everything is looked upon in terms of money, that we could well afford, for the sake of the past, present, and of future generations, to at least appropriate a little money and give over to the care of the Secretary of War this great city of the dead.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. May I ask where is this Congressional Cemetery?

Mr. ABERNETHY. About a mile from here, on the west bank of the Anacostia River. If you go out there, you will see right alongside this sacred cemetery a dump heap of trash and garbage and things of that kind, evidently in the effort to build up the land. I am not undertaking to say how much money shall be expended on this, but I have left it largely to the judgment of future Congresses and the Secretary of War and to that splendid Army officer, Major General Cheatham, who has charge of the Government cemeteries all over the country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Who are buried there?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I was just reading some of the names of those who are buried there: George Clinton, Vice President of the United States, was interred in the Congressional Cemetery, and his body was finally removed to New York; Tobias Lear, the faithful secretary to George Washington, was buried there; Push-Ma-Ta-Ha, a famous Indian chief; also Scarlet Crow, a famous Indian warrior; Gen. James Jackson, also a distinguished warrior; Mr. Justice Barbour, of the Supreme Court; Brockholst Livingston, also United States Supreme Court; William Wirt, a distinguished Attorney General of the United States; and Abel P. Upshur, former Secretary of State and Secretary of the Navy. Then I read into my remarks about Baron Frederick Greuhm, the famous first minister to the United States from the Kingdom of Prussia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman mentioned, I notice, Mr. Upshur—Abel P.?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes. I am glad the gentleman asked the question. I am delighted to know that what I had to say is arousing such deep interest of the membership. I really think we should be ashamed of ourselves for not caring for this wonderful place, and we ought to be ashamed because these patriotic women have called it to our attention.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Upshur was the Secretary of the Navy and also Secretary of State. I thank the gentleman very much for presenting the subject to Congress, and I hope what he says will have weight. It is rather disreputable of us, I think, that we have not done something.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose. I would like to know what appropriation is made for that cemetery now?

Mr. ABERNETHY. None whatever.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I was there about a month ago. It is in a very doleful condition.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes. There is a little parish down there. I do not know whether it is a mission parish or not. But there is a splendid rector there, formerly secretary to Senator WARREN, of Wyoming. He is now pastor of that church. I took the matter up with him. There is a little fund that they have laid off to themselves to care for their part of the cemetery. Their part, of course, is naturally kept up in very splendid condition.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I will be glad to.

Mr. MADDEN. Is this a private cemetery?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Not the part I am talking about. It is a combination.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the term "Congressional Cemetery" mean anything more than the name?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. What does it mean?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am glad the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has asked these questions, and I am glad of his interest. I want to call his attention to a Senate document which was published in 1906 giving a complete history of the Congressional Cemetery, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, Document No. 72, showing that the Government owns certain lands in that cemetery, and none of these Members of Congress or Senators or distinguished officials of the United States are buried on any other ground than that which belongs to the United States Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him with another question?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I remember that many years ago Mr. Brownlow, of Tennessee, a Member of the House, served with me on the Committee on Appropriations. He came in here with tears in his eyes one day—and, really, they were tears, you know—and he was pathetic. He wanted the grave of Andrew Johnson, a former President of the United States, taken care of by the United States. We acceded to his urgent appeal, and that is the only grave of any President of the United States who lies buried anywhere on the continent which is being taken care of at the expense of the Government. Now, the question arises—and I am not saying this captiously—how far can we go in the care of the cemetery about which the gentleman has spoken?

Mr. ABERNETHY. In answer to the gentleman's remarks, I will say that I can fully appreciate the fact that if the Government itself did not own the land then we might not be on strong and solid ground; but I call the distinguished gentleman's attention to the great burying ground of Arlington, which is maintained by the Government, and I call the gentleman's attention to the various Federal cemeteries all over the country.

Mr. MADDEN. That is a very proper thing where we have a national cemetery dedicated to that purpose.

Mr. ABERNETHY. But up until 1876 the Congress did appropriate. I have not taken the time to go into all the details of this, but Congress did appropriate money and there was legislative authority for the care of these graves. Let me say further that one of the troubles we have is that a part of this property belongs to the church and a part of it belongs to the Government. My bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to take charge of that part which belongs to the Government, to care for it and to preserve those graves, and I take it the gentleman would favor such legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. I think anything like that is a proper thing to consider.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How did the Government acquire the land originally?

Mr. ABERNETHY. It bought it, or it was donated, I am not sure which, but the title is in the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Through appropriations made for that purpose?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Either through appropriations or by gifts. In other words, there are about 500 lots there which belong to the Government.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. I want to suggest to the gentleman that I was in the Congressional Cemetery last year and spent considerable time there. The secretary of the association which controls that cemetery went over the ground quite a bit with me in looking for the grave of Push-Ma-Ta-Ha, who was one of the Indians holding a high commission in the Army and who died here. I asked him about the ownership and the present management of the Congressional Cemetery and, if I remember correctly, he told me that the interest of the United States Government in the lands therein, except such plots as were occupied by graves, had been surrendered by the Government to this church organization.

Mr. ABERNETHY. That is not correct.

Mr. BUSBY. I merely make that statement to ask the gentleman this further question: Since the date of the document you have exhibited, 1906, have you made an investigation as to the ownership of the land outside of the land on which there are graves?

Mr. ABERNETHY. There is no question about the fact that the Government owns a part of this land, and the Washington Parish, according to its rector, does not undertake to assert any claim to that part of the land. At one time there was some legislation sought here, which went before the District Committee, of which the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is a member. That legislation had to do with vacating certain streets for the purpose of establishing more cemetery plats. The bill passed the House but did not pass the Senate. There was some effort at that time on the part of certain ones to remove some of these cenotaphs, particularly where there were no bodies under these monuments.

Mr. LANKFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD. I was in this cemetery two or three years ago and it is my recollection that there are several men and women buried there at one place who were killed during the Civil War by an explosion in the navy yard, and there is a large monument erected to those people.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that. In the article from the magazine of the Daughters of the American Revolution, which is incorporated in my remarks, I read further, and I am quoting from it because it shows a great deal of study, of the subject by the writer:

> Pausing before a weather-stained monument of simple design, one reads inscribed thereon the story of one of the most regrettable tragedies of the early American Navy.

This comes in very aptly when we are considering the naval bill. Now, listen to this:

> Beneath the monument, side by side in a single grave, rest the bodies of Capt. Beverley Kennon and Abel Parker Upshur—

The gentleman who was spoken of by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Governor MONTAGUE—> victims of the explosion of a gun aboard the U. S. frigate Princeton, February 28, 1844. Both natives of Virginia, the two men formed a friendship in early youth that lasted even to the grave.

Now, here is another very interesting excerpt which I will read from this article in the magazine:

> For many years a touch of romance was added to the cemetery by the grave of Nathan Cilley, a Member of Congress from Maine, of brilliant promise, who fell on the field of honor at Bladensburg, Md., one of the last victims of the duello in this country. The body of Representative Cilley has since been removed to his home in Maine, but the circumstances of his death are still told with the cemetery legends.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What was the appropriation that the Government previously made for the maintenance of this cemetery?

Mr. ABERNETHY. A small amount from time to time carried in an appropriation bill, probably $1,000 or $2,000. At one time they helped to put an iron fence around the cemetery and at another time they appropriated a little money for aiding in the upkeep of it.

Mr. BRIGGS. What reason was given for the discontinuance of that upkeep?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Economy and neglect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ABERNETHY. May I have a few minutes more? I have had a number of interruptions.

Mr. AYRES. I yield the gentleman five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. When I visited this cemetery I found it impossible to tell what actual interments had taken place and what had not. It seemed to have been the custom to erect a small monument there to any Member of Congress who died during a certain period regardless of where he was buried; is not that the fact?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Some of those cenotaphs are there while the bodies are elsewhere, but they stopped that custom in 1876.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Then how may one know who is buried there and who is not?

Mr. ABERNETHY. The records of the cemetery are open to every one and I am going to put a list of them in the RECORD, with the permission of the House.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks in this particular. I am going to supply this data, and not only supply such data as to those who are buried there but also give the names and the dates of their deaths so that the House may know all the facts.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I think the neglect is a reproach on the Congress and is a thing that ought to be taken care of.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask leave to incorporate any documents?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes; I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to incorporate in my remarks lists taken from this document.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks, and to incorporate therein certain data which he has indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Now, gentlemen, I will not undertake to read further from this article, because I have permission to put it in the RECORD. I simply want to say I consider this one of the sadly neglected spots which we should now attend to. The bill which I have introduced has been referred to the great Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and I hope the membership of the House will read the remarks I make here to-day, because I am going to incorporate in my remarks the names of men from nearly every State in the Union, men of character, men of discernment, men who have written their names high on the scroll of fame, and I am sure this Congress, even at this late date, will not be remiss in its duty in undertaking to beautify and take care of this sacred spot, and will say to this worthy and great patriotic organization, the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, "We are pleased you have called this to our attention. We will respond and respond promptly." [Applause.]

The lists referred to by Mr. ABERNETHY are as follows:

The names of the deceased Senators, Representatives, and other notables interred in the Congressional Cemetery in Government ground, State from which they come (if known), and date of death (if known), as shown by the register of the cemetery and inscriptions on the monuments, are as follows:

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is my purpose to talk to you during the time I shall occupy the floor regarding the great future of the South—my section of the country. I am sure it is rapidly being recognized that the South is at least one of the garden spots of the United States. We are so favored by climate and by nature in the way that is necessary for a people to develop that we are rapidly attracting the attention of capital and industry from every section of this country and from other places.

I know there has been throughout the history of our Nation a belief in certain sections of our country that the South is not developed, that it has a great many people in it who are not educated, and that it has labored under various disadvantages. I am sure there are sections of the country and individuals in such sections of the country who are yet asking the question that Nathanael asked on one occasion: "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth," and I would reply with the answer of Philip when he said, "Come and see." This is the only proposition we have to offer you about the greatness of the South. Come and see.

I am sure many times we forget to take into consideration the difference in the length of time that the Northern and Eastern States have had in which to develop, compared with the time in which the South has had to develop and the hardships through which it has been forced to go.

For instance, take the New England States—the North and East—we find that for more than 200 years they have been pushing forward under circumstances favorable to development, while not much more than 100 years has the South been opened to settlement. It was only in 1817 that Mississippi became a State. About 20 years after that we had a great period of land speculation, booms of all kinds in the way of land trading. Mushroom banks grew up, and then came the panic of 1837, which swept all of this fictitious prosperity away. We went along for a period of about 25 years after that and the Civil War came upon the country. The history of the destruction through which the South went during that war is too familiarly known to each one of us, and it would serve no good purpose for me to repeat it. We saw practically all that had been accumulated in wealth in the South swept away by the horrors of war. The torch had consumed our farm buildings, homes, and other property; the animals and other property that were usable in times of war had been carried away. When the war ended in 1865 our people found themselves practically destitute from the standpoint of means and the things necessary for a livelihood.

But our troubles were not ended there, because at the close of the war we entered upon the beginning of a misgovernment orgy that swept away the few remaining assets we had and that pledged the credit of our States for years to come to meet bond issues and expenditures that were totally unjustified. I mention this here not out of any spirit of animosity for what happened and the great wrong done our people, but merely to show the great disadvantage my section of the country was confronted with from an economic standpoint.

I shall not deal with my State of Mississippi in disclosing the great waste brought to the South by the carpetbagger, scalawag, and negro governments, because its records on that point are not so complete as the records in other States. I am going to read you some excerpts from a book entitled "Reconstruction of the Constitution of 1866 to 1876," by John W. Burgess, professor of political science and constitutional law, dean of the faculty of political science at Columbia University in New York, and I presume a northern man.

The proposition as he presents it with regard to South Carolina is:

> During the year 1872, in addition to all this, there came to the knowledge of Congress and of the people of the North the frightful and scandalous corruption of the "State" governments in the South. It is very difficult to get at distinct and reliable facts upon a subject which officials undertake to cover up and keep shrouded in darkness. But the record of these doings in South Carolina was something as follows: The house of representatives, the majority of the members of which were negroes, and the presiding officer of which was the notorious F. J. Moses, spent $95,000 to refurnish its assembly hall where the aristocrats of South Carolina had never spent over $5,000. Clocks costing $600 each, sofas $200 each, chairs at $60 each, desks at $125 each, mirrors at $600 each, cuspidors at $8 each—such were the items of the bill. In the four years from 1868 to 1872, $200,000 were expended for furniture for the legislative chambers alone. Then came the bills of supplies, sundries, and incidentals, amounting in one session to $350,000, $125,000 of it for a free restaurant, lunch counter, and bar, at which the members and their friends fared most royally, eating, drinking, and smoking and paying not a penny therefor directly nor indirectly, since many, if not most, of the members of that legislature paid no stiver of the taxes. Then came the printing bills, averaging more than $150,000 a year where $10,000 would have been more than enough to pay every legitimate expense of that kind.
> Then came the sale of franchises of all kinds, and the pledging of the credit of the "State" in the form of bonds to aid all sorts of enterprises pretended to be set on foot, or promoted, as is now said, by combinations of legislators or officials or their friends. In 1868 the "State" debt was about $5,000,000 with almost enough assets to pay it. In 1872 the assets had disappeared and the debt was more than $18,000,000 and nothing worth mentioning to show for it. And all this when the "State" taxes had been raised from less than a half million of dollars a year on a valuation of over $400,000,000 to $2,000,000 a year on a valuation of less than $200,000,000 of property.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Was the legislature responsible for this exorbitant expenditure in money in South Carolina composed of natives?

Mr. BUSBY. Most of them were natives, but were ignorant colored people, few of whom could read or write, under the supervision and superintendence of carpetbaggers who came down there to get what they could from what we had left after the war. That was the situation in South Carolina, the debt having been increased from $5,000,000 to $18,000,000, the assets of the State swept away, while the credit of the State was mortgaged for the future.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. In response to the question put by the gentleman from New York, I want to quote Horace Greeley, who said that—

> The carpetbaggers came down there, and when they arrived in the State they set their carpetbags down and said, "Let us prey."

[Laughter.]

Mr. BUSBY. That is fine. Now, I want to refer to another State, that of Louisiana, by this same authority, and show what was done.

LOUISIANA

Under the leadership of the brilliant young adventurer, Henry C. Warmoth, of Illinois, the financial history of the "State" was even more scandalous. During the four years of Warmoth's governorship, from 1868 to 1872, the average annual expenditure of the "State" government was about $6,000,000, when measured by the previous experiences of the "State" $600,000 would have been ample to defray all legitimate expenses. At the beginning of Warmoth's administration the debt of the "State" was between six and seven millions of dollars, with more than enough assets to extinguish it. At the end of the four years of his power in 1872, the debt was nearly $50,000,000, the assets had all disappeared, and there was nothing worth mentioning to show for the one or the other.

In the counties and municipalities of both "States" the corruption was equally rampant, shameless, and vulgar. It is impossible to obtain exact figures in regard to it or to estimate with any degree of exactness or even probability the amounts stolen and made away with. In the other reconstructed "States," where the adventurers and the negroes held sway, the "State" governments worked along the same lines, though not to the same appalling extent.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr BUSBY. I will yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Colonel Warmoth is a constituent of mine and lives in the first congressional district. I have no interest in him politically; he is a lifelong Republican. I know his son. Colonel Warmoth was never a scalawag nor a carpetbagger in the iniquitous sense that looted the South. Colonel Warmoth remained there and invested everything he had in the sugar industry and has endeavored to promote the best interests of the State.

Mr. BUSBY. My opinion from history is that the gentleman's statement is awry. Warmoth went there as a carpetbagger, one of the great despoilers of that State; and when he got whipped by another organization that was worse than he, he settled down to become a citizen.

Now I am mentioning this subject for no other purpose than to show you the deplorable condition of the finances of the South after 1875 and 1876.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman does not intend to use this as a campaign issue, I hope. Surely he is not going as far back as that?

Mr. BUSBY. No; if I were going to use it for a campaign issue I would bring out some worse things; but instead I am stressing the economic situation.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I will.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is it the gentleman's intention to prove that the Republicans were corrupt at that time?

Mr. BUSBY. I do not think there is need of any proof of that. Everybody admits it.

Mr. KING. "Birds of a feather flock together."

Mr. BUSBY. Yes; I have heard that statement at the other end of the Capitol. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I will.

Mr. HOGG. I wonder if the gentleman from Mississippi will tell us how many qualified voters there are in the State of Mississippi. I am interested in the data he is giving.

Mr. BUSBY. I can tell you how many votes were cast. About 350,000 people voted in the last election, and I suppose they were qualified or they would not have voted.

We did the best we could in the South to mend our financial condition after the period of reconstruction. We went along until the panic of 1893, which swept over the country, and I believe it hit the South worse than other sections, because we were less able to bear it for the reasons stated. We went on and a few years later the World War came. Like the rest of the country, we entered into that and went through with it. The last six or seven years I feel has been practically the only period that the Nation has had time in which to direct its attention to the South. During that time we have made wonderful strides and progress.

Within recent years factories of almost all kinds have been established in the South. Especially is this true with regard to cotton factories.

MAJORITY OF COTTON SPINDLES IN THE SOUTH

In the past we have thought of the manufacture of cotton as being an occupation confined almost wholly to the New England States. That is not the case at present. The cotton manufacturing industry is drifting toward the South—the land in which cotton is grown, where ideal conditions exist for the establishment and operation of cotton factories. There we have a better climate than has New England; the natural resources in water power, coal, hydroelectric power, and materials suitable to the manufacture of cotton are almost ideal. Another advantage is that it is not necessary to pay high freights on the raw product from the field to the mills.

I have before me the report from the Bureau of the Census on the activity in the cotton-spinning industry for January, 1928. It shows that there are 36,000,349 cotton-spinning spindles in place in this country; 18,424,000 of these are located in cotton-growing States, as against 16,280,000 that are located in the New England States. This shows that 2,144,000 more spindles are located in the South than are located in the New England States.

This is a striking bit of information, but not so striking as the fact that this same report shows that of the spindles in the Southern States only 553,000 were idle as against 3,870,000 idle spindles in the New England States during January. This is still not the most striking feature about the report. The active spindle hours for January for the spindles located in the Southern States averaged 308 hours per spindle in place. This was a little less than 12 hours per day for 26 working-days in the month. The active spindle hours for January for the New England States averaged per spindle in place 143 hours. This was 5½ hours per day for 26 working-days in the month.

We have all along thought of Massachusetts as being the leading cotton-manufacturing State of the Union. In this same report it is shown to have 10,111,000 spindles, which is a little less than one-third of the spindles in the entire country.

The same report shows that the spindles in Massachusetts had active spindle hours for January, average per spindle in place, only 130 hours for the month, against 324 hours per spindle for South Carolina, 320 hours per spindle for North Carolina, and a 308-hour average per spindle for the entire South for the month.

I am calling your attention to these things as an example of what is taking place in the South.

Now, you can easily see the idleness that exists in the cotton-spinning industry in the New England States as compared with the cotton-spinning industry in the South. Per spindle, it does not come within half of the number of employed hours as do the southern spindles.

In Mississippi, the State in which I have the honor to represent the fourth congressional district, capital has come in recent years in leaps and bounds. We have modified some of our laws so as to make them more inviting to outside capital. We have enacted statutes that will exempt factories, manufacturing establishments, and other industries from taxes for a period of five years. A bill is before our State legislature, which is now in session, that provides that all cattle, sheep, hogs, and goats in the State of Mississippi shall be exempt from all State, county, and ad valorem taxes for a period of 10 years. We have repealed some of our objectionable antitrust laws that did so much to drive capital out of Mississippi. As we now stand, Mississippi has a system of laws that is most attractive to honest capital for honest business looking forward to the development of the great resources of our great State.

The report of Hon. Walker Wood, the secretary of state of Mississippi:

FOREIGN CAPITAL COMES TO MISSISSIPPI

The following figures show the amount of "domestic and foreign capital which qualified to do business in Mississippi for the years 1921 to 1927, inclusive."

I am not going to refer to domestic capital but to foreign capital only, or capital coming into the State from the outside. The foreign capital in 1921 amounted to $5,075,000; in 1922, to $6,283,000; in 1923, $10,617,000; in 1924, to $4,218,000; in 1925, to $6,098,000. About that time we repealed some of our antitrust laws, so that in 1926, instead of its being a little over $6,000,000, as it was the year before, outside capital amounted to $219,000,000, and in 1927 it jumped to $586,000,000. To sum up: Foreign capital which qualified to do business in Mississippi for the period 1920 to 1923 was $62,907,400; for the period of 1924 to 1927 it was $815,907,890.

The banks in Mississippi, according to a recent statement of the State bank examiner, show a corresponding increase in bank resources and a correspondingly healthy financial condition throughout the State.

MISSISSIPPI BECOMING A GREAT DAIRYING STATE

I hold in my hand an article written by Mr. Ben Hilbun, of Starksville, Miss., dealing with the dairying industry of the State. Attached to this article is a map of Mississippi, with counties marked. On this map are shown 96 plants relating to the dairying industry.

The first creamery was established in Mississippi in 1912 at the Agricultural and Mechanical College, which is the State college for boys. That was in the dark days when the boll weevil with his devastation and destruction first visited our cotton fields. Cotton had been our principal money crop, but we had been forced by what appeared to be an enemy to turn to something other than cotton in order to raise the necessary cash with which to pay our taxes and other expenses. Seventeen thousand pounds of butterfat were used by this creamery during its first year, for which it paid $4,423 to the farmers in the surrounding territory. That was a little more than 16 years ago. A few months ago, when Mr. Hilbun wrote his article, there were 27 creameries operating in the State. These produced butter valued at about $3,500,000 during 1927, compared with the production of a little more than $4,000, 15 years before. Some creameries are operated cooperatively by farmers, others by incorporated capital, and others in various ways. The first great milk plant of the State was located at Starksville, Miss., by the Borden Southern Co. about three years ago. This was a milk-condensing plant. I am informed that this plant was built with an understanding with the people that they would furnish it with 40,000 pounds of milk per day.

The reception accorded the plant by the farmers in the surrounding territory was so cordial that in about 60 days it was receiving around 60,000 pounds of milk per day; a few weeks later the supply had reached 80,000 pounds per day, and within about a year the milk supplied this plant was around 120,000 pounds per day, and had overrun the capacity of the plant. The Borden Co. was forced to notify the people in the surrounding territory through the county papers that the plant's capacity had been overrun and that they could not use all the milk that was being supplied until the plant could be enlarged. This was done as rapidly as possible, and it is, I am informed, at the present time using about 200,000 pounds of milk per day. No industry was ever accorded a warmer reception than was the dairying business by the people of Mississippi.

Following the Borden plant at Starksville, the Carnation Milk people established a milk-condensing plant at Tupelo, Miss. Its experience in receiving a milk supply was similar to the experience of the Borden plant at Starksville. The Borden Co. established a second milk-condensing plant in Mississippi at Macon, about 40 miles southeast of Starksville. The Pet Milk people, of St. Louis, Mo., are now engaged in constructing a milk-condensing plant at Kosciusko, in my district. This plant, with all equipment, I am informed, will cost around $500,000, and will pay to the farmers in the surrounding territory for milk supplied from $3,000 to $4,000 per day the year round, but I shall refer more at length to this plant a little later.

A considerable number of cheese factories have been established in the State within the past year. They are coming so rapidly that I am unable to tell you just how many have been built, but I am sure it is safe to say as many as 15 cheese factories have been built or are being built. Three have been begun in my district since I came here in the past December. They will be ready for operation during the coming summer. They are located at Houston, Water Valley, and West Point.

Heretofore it has been believed that cheese making could not be profitably carried on in the South. There was some notion that probably the weather was too warm and was not favorable to making the highest quality of cheese. Last summer the Kraft Cheese Co. was constructing a plant at Durant, Miss. They had several places in view for additional cheese factories, but would not proceed with any additional factories until they had finished the Durant plant and had produced cheese in it. This they did, and found that the section of the country and the milk received were suitable to the manufacture of the very highest grade of cheese. Since then Kraft has established a great number of plants in northeast Mississippi.

Barbour & Co., Kramer, and others interested in the cheese business are placing large cheese factories in Mississippi.

Mississippi has about 65 ice-cream plants, which produce about one and one-half million gallons of ice cream annually. Mississippi has four dried-buttermilk plants. It has five wholesale milk shipping centers, which supply New Orleans, Memphis, Birmingham, and other large cities with approximately one and one-half million gallons of whole milk annually.

The best information available at the present time as to the value of the milk products in Mississippi for 1927 is that they are around $18,000,000 to $20,000,000. There is every reason to believe that with the rapid incoming of milk plants, cheese factories, creameries, and so forth, the value of milk products in Mississippi will be doubled within the next two or three years.

Our people are rapidly securing high-grade milk-producing cows to take the place of all scrub stock which is being as rapidly disposed of.

We have a suitable climate for the dairying industry. The winters are mild and the temperature is rarely above 95 in the summer. Pasturage is good for about seven months in the year, making it unnecessary to feed the milk producers except very little during that time. Many people secure splendid results in milk production from pastures alone. In fact, practically no one feeds the year round. We have an abundance of pure, fresh, running water.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How are these dairies kept up? Do they have agricultural products there sufficient to keep up, or do they have to import feed from the North?

Mr. BUSBY. We do not have to import any kind of feed. The very best feed for dairy cattle is Lespedeza hay, cottonseed hulls, and cottonseed meal; silage and hays produced locally. These are the best milk producers that our people have been able to find, and they are grown in the territory where we have the dairying industries. Alfalfa is grown in abundance in some sections of our State; soy beans, velvet beans, Johnson grass, clover, and almost every other variety of hay can be produced; corn is also grown in abundance, it being one of the two main crops in Mississippi. In fact, we can produce all the home-grown feed necessary.

Now I wish to go back to the subject of the Pet Milk Co. plant at Kosciusko. I would like to call your attention very briefly to what one northern paper had to say about this particular plant, and it happens that this paper is printed in Chicago, the home of Mr. MADDEN, chairman of the Appropriations Committee. It is entitled "Farm and factory."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Could I have a little more time?

Mr. AYRES. About how much time would the gentleman wish?

Mr. BUSBY. Five minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BUSBY. Officials of the Pet Milk Co. make the statement with much pride that they have never established a plant in a community without bringing a greater degree of prosperity to the people. I read:

PET MILK CO. PLANT AT KOSCIUSKO

The development of the dairy industry in the State of Mississippi is still at a high temperature. The Pet Milk Co. will construct their fifth milk-condensing plant in the South at Kosciusko, Miss., on the Illinois Central Railroad. The five plants have been constructed during the past 12 months. This company has been gradually finding its way into the South because of its faith in dairy possibilities in that territory. They had been branching out into southeast Missouri and also into Maryland, and when the recent dairy fever swept the South the Pet people did not hesitate to cast their lot in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi. Other plants will be considered by them wherever the raw material is available.

The plant to be built at Kosciusko will be a typical Pet milk plant. The ground plan is approximately 120 feet by 240 feet. The plant, when completed, will cost $225,000. Up-to-date machinery will be installed throughout and most of the work will be done by these labor-saving devices. However, the plant will employ about 40 men in all departments. The plant will be equipped to handle 200,000 pounds of milk per day and ready to meet a larger supply if necessary. The Pet Milk Co. is too well and favorably known to need an introduction to the territory they have decided to locate plants in, because nearly every family has been introduced through the canned products coming into their homes. They will be more than welcomed by the people of Kosciusko.

Officials of the Pet Milk Co. make the statement with much pride that they have never established a plant in a community without bringing a greater degree of prosperity to the people. To have sufficient supplies for their big plant there must be highly developed dairying in the community. A capacity supply of milk for the plant means a pay roll to the farmers of from three to four thousand dollars per day. This should be a highly desired distribution of wealth to any community.

The good people of Kosciusko fully appreciate this and have engaged a dairy expert on full time to develop increased production of milk for the plant. More farmers are becoming interested, cows are being bought, pure-bred sires are being sought, and the development bureau of the Illinois Central is lending its cooperation in every way possible.

The foundation for this plant was laid by the Illinois Central Railroad when it promoted the creamery at West, Miss., in 1914. (Farm and Factory, Chicago, Ill., January, 1928.)

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, the publication that prints the news about so much prosperity in Mississippi is a successful publication, and I hope the industry it speaks about will be successful. There is no doubt but that, sooner or later, industry in the South is going to make the South blossom like the rose, and the day can not come too soon to meet my views of what ought to happen. I would like to see the South succeed in every phase of its activities, and when they have begun to realize the necessity of employment of the people in the manufacture of goods to be used by people everywhere, then it will be for the first time that the people of the South will realize that the economic development of the South will depend in a large measure on the activities of their people along lines that will cooperate with industries in other sections of the country; and that can not come too soon to make me happy. [Applause.]

Mr. BUSBY. Following that, I have tried to detail to you here the financial conditions through which we have gone as a section of the country, to illustrate the proposition that heretofore we have been destitute of capital, and for good reasons. We have a great people, industrious, true, and patriotic; no better or finer people can be found anywhere. We have had the spirit and the mind and effort, and have been willing and have striven all along to do those things that you suggest, and the things we ought to have done and would have done but for the financial catastrophes I have mentioned, for which we were not to blame and which we could not avert; but you can not develop a section of the country without capital, and under the circumstances I have mentioned as having overtaken us from time to time we have been denied that opportunity of peacefully going along and taking the action necessary to make the desired development that we were entitled to, and that is now coming in our section of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I have a resolution which I will ask to have the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the resolution referred to. Is there objection?

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution

Whereas there are organizations in the United States who undertake to protest against every measure directed at adequate national defense of the United States by arranging to have thousands upon thousands of letters sent to Members of Congress against such measures; and

Whereas these letters are usually of a very similar character and frequently contain direct or indirect threats of a political nature against Members of Congress; and

Whereas it is alleged that these campaigns against any military measure, even for necessary national defense, are undertaken on a commercial basis, are misleading, false, and are improperly attempting to influence national legislation; and

Whereas it is further alleged that certain of these organizations are dominated, financed, and inspired by domestic and foreign interests with ulterior purposes against the best interests of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives appoint a select committee to consist of nine Members, which committee is authorized and directed to conduct a thorough investigation of organizations, associations, or leagues of whatever nature that have for their purpose protesting or organizing and leading protests against the military and naval defense programs of the United States. The committee shall investigate the personnel, financing, interrelationships with other organizations of whatever nature and purpose, administration, and propaganda methods of such organizations and report its findings to the House of Representatives as soon as possible with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

For the purposes of such investigation, the committee is authorized to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Congress, at the seat of government and elsewhere, to employ such stenographic services to report its hearings, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures (including expenditures for travel) as it may deem necessary. The committee is further authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to take testimony. The Speaker is authorized, upon the request of the committee, to issue subpœnas for such purposes, and the Sergeant at Arms of the House is directed to serve the subpœnas. Any person who willfully refuses to obey any such subpœna, and any witness guilty of contumacy, shall be liable to the penalty provided in section 102 of the Revised Statutes. All expenses of the committee incurred under this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by the committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the House, practically all Members of Congress have been bombarded with hundreds and thousands of letters in the last few weeks against the House Naval Affairs Committee's program. I know at least one Member who has received over 2,500 such letters. The character of these letters and the circumstances surrounding this campaign are too significant to be ignored. These letters have been no coincidence. It is evident they are a result of a well-organized, well-financed, and well-directed campaign.

The United States is not a militaristic nation; it is committed against any policy of a great standing army or navy. It is, however, committed to adequate national defense. Organized attacks against purely defense measures, attacks that are misleading, that misrepresent both to the people and to Congress, and that directly or indirectly threaten Members of Congress with political punishment can not go unchallenged.

I hold no brief for the present naval program. It should be judged on its merits, but it must be given exactly that opportunity. I do not charge that those who oppose it are insincere, or even that such a program is necessary. I deliberately withheld introduction of this resolution until after the present naval authorization program was voted upon. Now, however, we come to the time of looking into certain sinister phases of this whole situation. I stand squarely on the right of the people of this great Republic to petition Congress for redress, but I hold that it is a long cry from the legitimate right to petition Congress and the commercialized propaganda machines that arrange protests against any and every military or naval measure designed for our national defense at so much "per protest." I do not refer to those sincere organizations that are quietly and devotedly working to promote genuine peace—I am myself a member of several—but to these doubtful organizations that merely concentrate attacks against anything American in favor of anything foreign.

There is at least one organization in Washington, within the shadows of the White House, that boasts that it has 2,500 trusted agents throughout the country that can, on a day's notice, organize a campaign to Congress of from 50,000 to 250,000 letters. It is commonly charged that there are organizations participating in these campaigns that are run for profit and not patriotism. It is also commonly charged that these organizations are dominated and inspired, if not actually financed and directed, by foreign interests whose purpose is to render the United States defenseless. If these charges are not true, then they should be stopped; but if these charges are true, it is a most damnable outrage, and is a challenge to every red-blooded, home-loving American who is worthy of the name.

In any event, it is high time that Congress and the people of the United States are given the facts in the case. If these organizations are directed by true, loyal, and patriotic citizens of the United States, they are entitled to the proper recognition by the American people; but if they are carelessly, deliberately, or viciously misleading the American people in the interest of sinister foreign influences, they are traitors and should be driven out in the open, exposed, and kicked out of the country. [Applause.]

I for one, as a Member of Congress and a citizen of the United States, demand the facts and ask Congress to get them. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. I would like to yield just a little more time, if necessary, to make a suggestion in connection with the resolution. The chairman of the subcommittee is not advised of any particular group of individuals to which the gentleman refers. I do not know, in fact, that he refers to any particular person or group, but it seems to me, as chairman—and I am saying this without consultation with any other members of the subcommittee or the Congress—that if an inquiry is to be made along the line the gentleman recommends, I suggest that the committee also investigate the sources of propaganda and the propagandists in favor of increasing enormously every type of naval and military burden, in other words, that we make the special committee responsible for an inquiry into the other side of the question. [Applause.]

Mr. MAAS. I am perfectly willing to concur in that suggestion. I feel confident of the patriotic motives of the organizations that are working for the adequate defense of the country, but I will be delighted also to have an investigation made of their activities. If there are sinister influences at work on that side also, I am just as anxious to know that. What I want are the real facts in the whole matter.

Mr. FRENCH. I wish to say to the gentleman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? How does the gentleman stand on the Caraway resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. I beg to say that not only do Members of Congress receive letters protesting against what have been called defense programs, but they receive definite literature and arguments, propaganda, if you please, urging the most extravagant programs, which mean vast expenditures of money, under the guise, at least, of military defense. If those who protest against proposed programs are to be investigated then I submit that all groups or individuals who are urging increases of such programs be made the subject of a like inquiry.

Mr. MAAS. But in that connection does the gentleman get letters by the thousands and in the same language or approximately the same language?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, we get them so definitely that we are pretty certain they are inspired and that there is definite organization back of the propaganda.

Mr. MAAS. I agree with the gentleman then.

Mr. FRENCH. May I make this further observation: Personally I am not much inclined to think the country or this Congress is going to be disturbed very much by propaganda. Propaganda is said at its best to be education. That is true. At its worst it is vicious, lying statements calculated to mislead. The Members of this body ought to sort out the good from the bad, or assemble facts which will enable them to choose between the right and the wrong, the true and the false. That is our responsibility. We should not stifle criticism. It may be we ought to do what the gentleman suggests. I do not know, but if so, we ought to make the inquiry complete. Are programs urged in the name of national defense that upon closer examination find their inspiration in navy yards or shipbuilding centers, or in personal ambitions that seem to be satisfied by lordly high command? Gentlemen must be impressed that not only are sound and reasonable programs being advocated but beyond that, and in the name of national defense there is urged every conceivable program that filches money from the Treasury in the name of necessary increase of the Naval and Military Establishments. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. When the gentleman has been in Congress a little longer he will learn to pay less attention to paid propaganda. After all I should like to know who is influenced by all this that we know to be only propaganda? I think the gentleman would probably serve Congress and the country better if he would provide in his resolution for larger wastebaskets in which to deposit this stuff that we all recognize as propaganda, usually emanating from a paid source.

Mr. MAAS. Well, it is misleading, and I want not only the Congress to know about it, but the country.

Mr. TILSON. These sources of propaganda do not mislead anybody except the few victims who contribute for the purpose of sending out this sort of propaganda. They are the ones who are victimized. Members of Congress do not care about it and as a rule they pay no attention to such stuff. It is for the most part rubbish and nonsense so far as Members of Congress are concerned, and we should pay no attention to it. We should not even dignify it with an investigation.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman believes, I presume, that these things ought to be exposed and that we ought to know where they come from?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Then if you will pass what is known as the antilobbying bill you will have information about all these people. Congress is entitled to have the information the gentleman requests, and the lobby bill will require that information to be given to Congress by all corporations and individuals who undertake to influence Congress. That ought to be done, and I hope the subcommittee will report the bill to-morrow and that it will be favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee. Then I hope the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will interest himself sufficiently so that we may bring it before this House.

Mr. TILSON. I do not take these things quite as seriously as the gentleman does, for I do not feel that they can or do influence anybody.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman does not feel, then, that the people who come here for the purpose of influencing Congress ought to be dignified with the idea that they are lobbyists? I think they ought to be protected; I think lobbying ought to be made respectable and that those people who engage in it ought to be required to come here and tell who they are, whom they represent, and how much money they spend. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. REECE].

Mr. REECE. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in requesting recognition at this time is to discuss the question of an American merchant marine with particular reference to its relationship to our national defense, and I deem it not inappropriate to do so while we are considering the appropriations for a great arm of defense of the Government.

In the year 1920, with a view to promoting national defense and national commerce, the people of the United States, through their representatives in Congress, declared their intention to establish and maintain an American merchant marine.

It is well to note that in proclaiming this intention—and for the exact language of the proclamation, I refer you to section 1 of the merchant marine act—the thought of national defense took precedence, as it always should, over the idea of mere commercial advantage and financial gain. Close as we then were to the greatest of all wars, it was but natural that in seeking to reestablish our merchant fleets upon the seas we should give first consideration to the question of safeguarding our country's interests in time of national peril, and should relegate to a position of secondary importance the promotion of ocean commerce with other maritime nations.

I believe that as the Great War slowly recedes into the vista of the past we are in danger of losing our former sense of values in regard to American shipping. I believe that in debating this great national issue we are permitting commercial considerations to outweigh and obscure those other and more vital concerns which directly touch the question of national defense.

Let us not lose sight of the relative importance of these two main functions of the American merchant marine—to provide national safety, on the one hand, and to encourage international trade on the other. Let us remember that one of these is absolutely essential to our continued existence as an independent people, while the other, in time of stress, we could manage to do without. Thomas Jefferson appraised the matter correctly when he said, speaking of the merchant marine:

> As a branch of industry, it is valuable; as a resource of defense, it is essential.

In order that we may not be helpless in time of emergency, let us, in time of tranquillity, plan for adequate transoceanic service by fast American ships, built in American shipyards, owned, manned, and operated by American citizens, documented under the American flag, and dedicated to the twin objects of American defense and American peace-time commerce with friendly nations. Let us have a truly American merchant marine, with the emphasis on American.

Mr. Chairman, I am in full sympathy and accord with the laudable efforts of my distinguished colleagues, on both sides of the House, who seek to provide, by mail subventions, construction loans, and other forms of indirect aid, that material support which seems to be necessary if our shipowners are to compete successfully with the mercantile marines of other nations. In my opinion, these aids should be generously bestowed. And if there arises any question as to how a particular proposal is going to work out—whether, for instance, the amount of aid will prove too little or too much—then I say that we should err on the side of national safety, rather than on the side of national shortsightedness.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. REECE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman believe we might have done better had we appropriated part of the $274,000,000 which we approved the other day for 15 cruisers direct to a merchant marine, which could be used as a naval auxiliary in time of need?

Mr. REECE. I think some policy along that line might well be worked out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This would have kept our shipyards going and would have provided auxiliary ships.

Mr. REECE. Yes; and I think the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries may in the near future bring to the floor a bill which in a large measure meets the suggestion which has been offered by the gentleman from New York.

It was not so long ago in the world's history when every merchant ship was a full-fledged ship of war, carrying an ample complement of guns and a crew well trained in the use of lanyard and cutlass. And it is a matter of record that even after it had become the fashion to build one kind of vessel for a warship and quite another kind for a merchant ship merchantmen nevertheless continued to be used as naval auxiliaries whenever hostilities occurred between maritime nations. In our own case history tells us that the War of the Revolution and the War of 1812 were both to a great extent fought at sea by our merchant ships, converted into privateers, rather than by our regular ships of war.

In the War of the Revolution American privateers, which were simply armed American merchantmen, manned, of course, by our indomitable American seamen, carried the war across the ocean to the enemy's coasts and valiantly captured or destroyed three times as many enemy ships as did all our regular war vessels put together.

In the War of 1812—sometimes called the second war for independence—our converted merchantmen, upholding the glorious traditions won by our privateersmen of the former generation, inflicted six times as much damage on enemy shipping as did our entire Regular Navy.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the incontrovertible facts of history, available to every student, every strategist, every American patriot.

The vital war-time need for merchant ships was again forcefully illustrated during the Civil War, when the small Union Navy was augmented by hundreds of converted commerce carriers, without whose invaluable aid the Federal Government could not have maintained its effective blockade of southern ports. The records show that in order to man this improvised fleet the merchant marine contributed 7,500 officers and 40,000 seamen in the years from 1861 to 1865. I cite these figures because I believe that we are prone to forget what a momentous part our merchant service played in winning the war between the States.

The supreme value of the merchant marine for purposes of national defense was again brought home to us during the Spanish War, when for the first time in our history we were confronted with the necessity of transporting and maintaining large bodies of troops overseas. Many of the gentlemen within reach of my voice will recall that the Army and Navy transport services, made up wholly of merchant ships, came into being at this time; and as the fortunes of our merchant marine were then at low ebb, almost any American ship that would float was pressed into service, among them several old side-wheelers built during the Civil War. The fact is, that in their desperate efforts to secure sufficient tonnage the military authorities seized upon American ships of commerce, whether passenger vessels or freighters, wherever they could be found.

Our few fast trans-Atlantic liners—ships like the St. Paul, St. Louis, New York, and Paris—were armed with rapid-fire guns and quickly transformed into auxiliary cruisers. And if anyone is curious to know how they acquitted themselves, I refer them to that glorious page of American history on which is inscribed the story of how the converted merchant ship St. Paul, on June 22, 1898, off San Juan, P. R., under the heavy shore batteries of the enemy, met and defeated the fast Spanish torpedo-boat destroyer Terror and the Spanish cruiser Infanta Isabel. Mr. Chairman, I trust I will not be misunderstood when I say that that action might be called a battle between the Spanish Navy and the American merchant marine.

But in spite of memorable deeds such as the one just cited, our merchant service, as it existed at the time of the Spanish War, was not numerically equal to the task of supplying all our needs in the way of transports and naval auxiliaries, and we were forced to buy and charter many ships in the world market. We might well have taken the lesson to heart. We might well have determined that the future should find us at all times prepared to support the Navy with an adequate fleet of fast, modern merchant vessels, properly designed for conversion into cruisers, hospital ships, transports, supply ships, and colliers.

I say that we might have done all this, but, of course, we did nothing of the kind. We are an optimistic people, and one manifestation of our optimism is our notorious carelessness in providing for national defense. Living at peace with the world, untroubled by international jealousies, without desire to enlarge the national domain by foreign conquest, prosperous beyond the wildest dreams of less fortunate nations, we are accustomed to take our responsibilities lightly and to brand as alarmists those who occasionally remind us that the proper time in which to prepare for adequate national defense is not during the feverish days of war but during the blessed days of peace.

The next episode, therefore, was but a duplicate of the one just recounted. Disregarding the precious lessons learned in the War of the Revolution, in the War of 1812, in the Civil War, and in the war with Spain with respect to the value of a merchant marine we slowly drifted into the maelstrom of the World War, notwithstanding that we were inadequately equipped with transports and naval auxiliaries.

Mr. Chairman, it is significant that when war was declared against the Central Powers in April, 1917, we had not a single troopship sufficiently seaworthy and speedy to risk the perilous voyage across the submarine-infested Atlantic. In this dire emergency—as in so many other emergencies in our history—we called, of course, upon the country's old stand-by, the American merchant marine. It is a matter of record that 14 of our gallant ships of commerce, responding instantly to the appeal, were hastily converted into transports and forthwith bore the American advance guard overseas.

This expedition, as we all know, was the merest beginning. It soon developed that our deep-sea merchant vessels, few in number and for the most part unsuited in type, were unequal to the work of transporting and maintaining an overseas military expedition of 2,000,000 men. Fortunately for us, this happened to be a war in which we had powerful allies. While they continued to hold the enemy, we devoted our boundless wealth and energy to the heartbreaking task of building—in the shortest possible time—an adequate fleet of merchant vessels, in order to throw across the Atlantic our famous "bridge to France."

Under the able administration of the Shipping Board, aided by the country's most competent ship-construction experts, we built 2,300 ships, enough if placed end to end to have lined both sides of the highway between here and Baltimore. In order to accomplish this unheard-of task, we also had to build or finance hundreds of shipyards, and train and house thousands upon thousands of ship workers. Due to war-time inflation, this construction program cost us $3,000,000,000—a sum estimated to be four times as large as it would have been before the war. To this sum must be added another $5,000,000,000 paid out by the American people in ocean freight charges as a penalty for not having an adequate merchant marine upon the outbreak of hostilities in 1914. Had the lessons learned in other wars been heeded, a large part of this expenditure of $8,000,000,000 would have been unnecessary.

These are shocking and unpalatable truths. They offend both our pride and our complacency. And yet, like all great truths, they contain lessons of the utmost value, and for that reason should not and can not be glossed over. Bearing in mind that this $8,000,000,000 represents the cost of our unpreparedness in merchant ships, we find it easy to realize the truth of those memorable words of Admiral Gleaves, of the United States Navy, commander of convoy operations during the World War, when, in his History of the Transport Service, he made use of the following language:

> The outstanding lesson which the experience of the war has driven home to us is the value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine.

Mr. Chairman, these golden words furnish the text of my remarks, "The value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine." This, as Admiral Gleaves has so tersely expressed it, is the outstanding lesson which the Great War has driven home to us. But I submit that it is even more; that, in fact, as I have tried to show, it is the lesson which has been driven home to us by the experience of all the great wars in which we have ever participated on the sea—the war for independence, the War of 1812, the Civil War, the war with Spain, and the World War.

Is this outstanding and oft-repeated lesson to be once more disregarded? Are we to temporize forever with a situation which so profoundly affects our material well-being, our military and naval strength in time of peril, and our future destiny among the nations?

The speeches made on this most vital issue, almost without exception, stress the commercial importance of our merchant marine without, in my opinion, sufficiently stressing its value as a naval auxiliary. I desire merely to say that no one recognizes more clearly than I the great peace-time commercial advantage that accrues to any nation which possesses a strong merchant fleet. By all means let us have a merchant marine commensurate with our unparalleled prosperity and vast foreign trade. But let us not lose sight of the value of such a fleet as a naval asset in time of emergency, since it is one of the fundamental axioms of sea strategy that a navy without auxiliaries is a navy in name only. Let us, therefore, see to it that these auxiliaries, in the form of modern passenger and cargo steamers, are provided in generous numbers. The way for us to bring this about is to furnish those necessary aids which will make it possible for American citizens to own and operate American merchant ships in the ocean carrying trade of the world. Let us resolve that whatever may have been our mistakes in the past, we shall henceforth and forever recognize "the value in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine."

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REECE. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. It has always occurred to me, as a proponent of an adequate American merchant marine, that our weakness lay in the fact the country at large believes that all proposed legislation with respect to a merchant marine is intended to salvage a war investment. It has occurred to me that probably our strength would lie in a new attitude, and that is to demonstrate to the country that if we never had a war it would be economically justifiable at this time for the country to embark upon the policy which the gentleman is expatiating upon so clearly and so forcibly and so eloquently.

Mr. REECE. I think the gentleman is quite right in his statement that it is economically justifiable, and then in the event of war we would be much better prepared by having an adequate American merchant marine.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman permit another observation?

Mr. REECE. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I think it is generally admitted that the Panama Canal was constructed largely upon the theory that the American people believed it was a commercial enterprise, when it was really a military necessity. I do not mean to say that the Government deluded the people, but it was found diplomatic and sagacious to lead them along the lines of thought that it would make for a great commercial enterprise. As a matter of fact, it is singular that the incidental feature has subordinated what was really the principal feature, so that I agree with the gentleman that if we could prove to the country that a merchant marine is entirely justified economically there would follow the great result which the gentleman has in mind, and which he has so ably discussed—namely, an auxiliary to our Navy.

Mr. REECE. I quite agree with the gentleman.

As Thomas Jefferson would have said; it is valuable in commerce, it is essential in war.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the Panama Canal has served a very useful peace-time purpose.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I said the real purpose originally was that of military necessity, and the incidental purpose was a commercial one. In the course of time, as a result of the workings of fate, the incidental purpose has subordinated in importance what was the real purpose originally.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Thank God for that.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I join the gentleman in that fervent declaration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REECE. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement in regard to the value of a strong merchant marine as a part of our national defense. Has the gentleman given special attention to the proposition of very fleet ships like the proposed four-day boats for the north Atlantic, which are to make the trip across the ocean from dock to dock in four days? Has the gentleman considered how extremely useful such vessels would be in case of war?

Mr. REECE. The program which I am advocating would embrace such services, and to my mind it is essential to adequate national preparedness as well as advantageous commercially.

Mr. TILSON. If such a program could be carried out it would relieve to a very great extent the necessity not only for fast transport ships, but also for airplane carriers, as these vessels are proposed to be built so as to carry and use commercial airplanes.

Mr. REECE. They could easily be converted into airplane carriers in case of necessity.

Mr. TILSON. They could be used directly as airplane carriers, because by reason of their very great speed they would be able to run away from almost any enemy vessel.

Mr. REECE. That is quite true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will not the gentleman also stress the amount of good they could do in times of peace?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, certainly. That point is not overlooked and, in fact, is quite obvious, being the main purpose of the ships. The national-defense side of it is that which needs emphasizing most, and this the gentleman from Tennessee is doing ably and forcefully in his address to-day.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REECE. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am very much interested in the gentleman's interest in a merchant marine, because I am from a section of the coast, and I am pleased to see this able and conscientious Member of Congress from the interior so vitally interested in this great subject of an adequate merchant marine. I simply wanted to make this observation.

Mr. REECE. Those who dwell only upon the commercial aspects of this momentous subject seem disposed to overemphasize the necessity of having the merchant marine show a direct financial profit, though I think such is possible, as if there were not a multitude of indirect profits growing out of these all-important shipping operations. The question is a large one, and its discussion would take me too far afield. But I would like to point out that a great national industry such as commercial shipping is a source of indirect profits running into untold millions annually, irrespective of the profit or loss involved in the merely physical operation of the ships. Do we expect our National Guard to show a direct financial profit? Do we derive a direct financial return from the millions spent by the Federal Government on good roads? Has anyone ever been so fatuous as to propose that the Army and Navy should be placed on a paying basis? I for one believe that we should not attempt to justify our shipping operations solely from the standpoint of bookkeeping. Let us not lose sight of the intangible benefits—the indirect good—the all-round "value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine."

The congressional district which I have the honor to represent lies at some distance from the seaboard, in the pleasant valleys and rolling farm lands of eastern Tennessee. The sterling citizenry of that district—American to the core and engaged for the most part in quiet, agricultural pursuits—might well be pardoned if they possessed but a superficial knowledge of the present state of American shipping. I am proud to say, however, that the citizens of Tennessee have followed with eager interest and keen solicitude the varying fortunes of the American merchant marine. They realize its importance as a naval auxiliary. They know that without ample transoceanic service under the American flag they can not hope to secure the most advantageous freight rates when their surplus products are moved overseas to the great foreign markets. And so they have watched with admiration the ingenious efforts of the United States Shipping Board to establish an adequate merchant-marine service with inadequate ships, most of them built during the war for war-time use and, therefore, not the best suited for competitive commercial service to-day. They have noted with growing concern the feverish shipbuilding activities of the other great maritime nations, and the launching in foreign shipyards of whole fleets of fast, modern motor ships destined, in the absence of constructive legislation by the Congress of the United States, to drive our older war-built merchantmen from the seas.

Mr. Chairman, while we debate the issue here, let us pause long enough to look out beyond the audience gathered in the galleries surrounding this Chamber and endeavor in imagination to envisage those other American citizens on the farm lands of the interior, their faces intently turned in this direction as they patiently wait to see whether their chosen Representatives in Congress have at last fully come to realize "the value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine."

We have all seen the merchant marine in time of peace busily engaged in that purely commercial phase of its activities that invariably comes to the fore in these discussions. We all retain a mental picture of our merchant ships loading and unloading at the docks, of the busy wharf scenes, and the almost human work of the great cranes. We recall at will the cries of the stevedores and picture the husky longshoremen running the freight aboard or ashore, the little tugs carefully handling the giant steamers, and the passengers waving their last farewells as the ship's band plays a lively air. We mentally reproduce these scenes whenever reference is made to the merchant marine. It is a picture of peaceful industry, full of life and sunshine and color.

But there is another picture—more sombre, more dramatic, more intense—a picture that illustrates the more vital function of the merchant marine. If not so well known, it is nevertheless a picture which those of us who were privileged to play our modest part in the Great War still bear in vivid memory.

I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, the picture of a wild, tumultuous night in the mid-Atlantic, the waves running like liquid mountains, and the rain and sleet mingling with the flying spray. As the storm for an instant abates, the wind tears the clouds from the face of the moon and discloses, slowly creeping along through all the fury and dislocation of the storm, two lines of troopships, half smothered in foam, fighting their way eastward in the very teeth of the gale.

That, Mr. Chairman, is my picture of the American merchant marine. I like to look back upon it for, when all is said and done, most of us lead drab lives and only in our dreams manage to escape to other scenes of romance and enchantment. And so I like to look back and dream of those days when the merchant marine, in all its war-time glory, was making history—I like to remember that when the armistice was signed the transport service consisted of some 389 merchant ships, with 106 additional vessels ready to be taken over, a grand total of approximately 500 transports and supply ships, all belonging to the American merchant service. I think we realized then, even if some of us have forgotten now, "the value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine."

I am for an American merchant marine. I am not so much concerned whether it is privately owned, or publicly owned, so long as it is American owned. I think it is a laudable thing to have a merchant marine for peace-time commerce with friendly nations, and a still more laudable thing to have a merchant marine for war-time defense against unfriendly nations. Let us not play fast and loose with the Nation's safety, whatever we may do about the country's foreign trade. View the arguments from any angle you will, they will all be found to point in one direction. I have tried to indicate that direction. I have tried to show that we can not go far wrong if we consistently bear in mind "the value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

IMMIGRATION ACT AND NATIONAL-ORIGIN CLAUSE

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the immigration act of 1924 as amended provides for a system of determining the immigration quotas on the basis of the national origin.

The theory of the national origin is that the original native stock in 1920 is assumed to be the same as that of the white population enumerated in 1790, from which the original native stock is descended. That the annual quota of any nationality for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1927, and for each fiscal year thereafter, shall be a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of inhabitants in continental United States in 1920 having that national origin bears to the number of inhabitants of continental United States in 1920, the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100. The quota committee in its report submitted on December 15, 1926, took as the basis for determining the original native stock the volume, entitled "A Century of Population Growth," published by the Bureau of the Census in 1909. The quota committee admitted—that there was a considerable element of uncertainty in the classification.

The operation of the national-origin clause has been suspended and has never been in force. The law, however, has had the effect of causing a great deal of irritation and disturbance, and I believe that it should be repealed.

The advocates of the national-origin clause did not know what it would accomplish. It was offered on the floor of the House as an amendment to the immigration bill in 1924, and was overwhelmingly voted down by the Members of the House. I am glad to say that I voted against it at that time, and have voted against putting it in force at every opportunity I have had since.

The national-origin clause was added to the immigration bill in the Senate and was kept in the bill in conference.

WHAT NATIONAL-ORIGIN CLAUSE WOULD DO

If the national-origin clause is not repealed it will mean, according to the best information I can get on the subject, that Germany, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and the Irish Free State will lose more than 50 per cent of the number of immigrants now allowed to come from their countries and Russia and Italy will gain almost 100 per cent more than their present quota. This expressed in figures means that Germany, which now has a yearly quota of 51,227, will be reduced to 23,428, a loss of 27,799. Sweden, whose quota is 9,561, will be reduced to 3,259, a loss of 6,302. Norway, whose annual quota is 6,453, will be reduced to 2,267, a loss of 4,186. Denmark, whose quota is 2,789, will be reduced to 1,044, a loss of 1,745. The Irish Free State, whose quota is 28,567, will be reduced to 13,862, a loss of 14,705. A total loss of immigrants from these five northern European countries of 54,737 immigrants per year. These figures alone, to any unprejudiced person familiar with the history of these nationalities and their accomplishments in America, should be sufficient reason for the repeal of the law without further argument. I know how thorough and even technical the immigration laws are administered. The literacy test given to adults, and the intelligence test which is given to young children who are often confused and embarrassed, does not do them justice. I have seen a whole family turn back and give up their long anticipated hopes of coming to America because a member of the family of tender years was not able to pass the intelligence test and their parental love, of course, would not permit the parents to forsake their offspring.

Our consular officers, before granting visas to immigrants, make a careful examination of the applicant and then a second examination is made at Ellis Island.

I am not criticizing the law regarding a strict physical or mental examination or its administration, although in some cases I believe our officials are overtechnical, but I mention these matters to show that the immigrants we allow to enter the United States are not the riffraff that certain propagandists are trying to make the American people believe, but are strong, self-reliant, intelligent people who desire to better their condition and are desirous of working. They have heard of the United States of America as the land of opportunity and promise, and moved by the thought of improving their own and their children's condition come to our shores.

In several recent contests where prizes have been offered for the best essays on citizenship, school children, who have been born across the seas, have been awarded prizes.

THE ONLY NATIVE AMERICANS ARE THE AMERICAN INDIANS

It makes me tired to hear people speak disparagingly of immigrants. All of us or our ancestors were immigrants at some time or other and because some came 25 years or 100 years before others gives them no higher claim to citizenship or the opportunities that America offers. The door of opportunity is open to all. The acid test is not when did you or your ancestors come to America but what have you accomplished since you came here. Have you made good citizens? Have you made the most of your opportunities?

All of these nationalities which the law discriminates against have been home makers. Quite a large proportion of these early pioneers took up wild land which they cleared and made into farms and established homes where their children live to-day. The Mississippi Valley, which Lincoln called "The Valley of Democracy," is second to no section of our Nation or the world in agriculture, industries, and wealth or in the establishment of its schools and great State universities. The marvelous development of the Mississippi Valley and the Middle West is due in a large measure to the hard work, energy, and sacrifice made by the races of people which the national origin law would discriminate against.

The national-origin clause should be repealed. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to make a short but earnest appeal for the support of the Air Mail Service. I want to make an appeal for it on the ground that it constitutes valuable reserve for our national defense. I also want to make an appeal for it on the ground that it is entitled to the support of Members of Congress in its growth and development.

I went out the other day and took a flight with that national hero of whom we are all justly proud, Colonel Lindbergh, and came back and promptly introduced a bill H. R. 12291, to provide that Members of Congress and officers of the executive departments should be authorized to use the Government Air Mail Service.

What is the situation to-day? Congress created the Air Mail Service several years ago, but we have made no provision to use it ourselves.

We "ballyhoo" through the country urging private concerns to support the air mail by giving it their business, but we refrain from giving it our own business. We loudly and profusely praise with words the achievements of this latest and most up-to-date enterprise, and yet we completely ignore it in our official activities. We claim we want our Government business transacted with efficiency and economy and yet we condemn ourselves to the antiquated choice of slow mail on the one hand or the expensive telegraph on the other.

Colonel Lindbergh has been now for three days taking up group after group of Members of Congress on these 20-minute air trips. I wonder why he does it. Certainly there can be no thrill in it for him. Last summer he spent weeks flying from city to city all over this country, a distance of 22,000 miles. Certainly that was not for the mere purpose of receiving the praise and applause of the people. To my mind, these flights, which to him must be tame and tiresome, were made and are being made to arouse public interest in aviation and support for the air mail service from which he came. He has his whole heart in this work and looks upon the air mail service as the most promising avenue for the development of aviation in this country.

I read from a speech by the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Glover, in which he says:

> The greatest need of the air mail to-day is that a great universal advertising campaign should be inaugurated to sell the air mail.

When can we start with the greatest need that the commercial aviation has to-day—advertising? Colonel Lindbergh has done some wonderful advertising. Let us do him the honor to confess ourselves converts to his publicity campaign. If we ask the private business concerns of the country to patronize and support it with their patronage, we, the greatest of all business concerns, should give it our patronage also.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. I will.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. On what terms would the gentleman give our business to the air mail—we have franking privilege and the penalty, but it gives the Government no money. I would be willing to go along with the gentleman if he will point out how to do it.

Mr. SWING. The bill I have introduced provides that the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate shall be authorized to supply Members with air-mail stamps for postage on official first-class correspondence requiring expeditious transmission. It accords the same privilege to the executive departments. It provides that the Post Office Department shall furnish air-mail stamps which shall have printed on the face the fact that they are for official use only. It provides the same penalty for the use of air-mail stamps for private business that is now a penalty for the misuse of the franking privilege.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Would not the air-mail companies send in a bill to the Government for the carrying of that mail?

Mr. SWING. The stamps for Members of Congress would be bought out of the contingent fund of the House and out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other officials out of the contingent funds of the various departments.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It will cost money to make these special stamps. After all, it is to be left to the discretion of the Members, so far as the question of the expedition of their mail and necessity for the use of the air service is concerned. Why would not the gentleman better provide in his bill that such official mail be stamped "Air mail" if it is to go by air mail, and that would save all of the red tape and all of the expense.

Mr. SWING. I am not concerned with the details of how it is accomplished. I do think, however, that the requirements of the use of an air-mail stamp is the better practice. It would cost no more to print the stamp with the words "for official use only" than otherwise, because they are going to print the stamps anyway, and I feel a good deal like my old father said when he gave me my first pocketbook. He said it would help me to save my money, because if I kept loose change in my pocket, I would spend it before I knew it, but if I have to first reach for my pocketbook and open it up to take out the change, I would think twice before spending it. So in this case, in order that the expense may not run into any large figures, the stamps are in the Congressman's desk and he must stop, think, and decide whether his letter is such as requires expeditious transition, before using the air-mail stamp. Of course, in the long run it must be left to each one's individual honor and judgment and that will seldom go wrong.

But, to-day, as I pointed out, the Members of Congress have only the one choice of slow mail or expensive telegrams. Before the air mail was adopted, I used to get from 10 to 12 telegrams a day. Now I get 4 to 5 telegrams a day and from 4 to 5 air-mail letters. I am still sending the same number of telegrams as formerly, but I know that if we are given the privilege of the air mail, that I can cut my telegraph bill in two and save the Government much more on telegrams than my air mail will cost.

Then the saving in time is important. It takes five days for ordinary mail to go from here to my district in California, and two and a half days is the flying time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman having a hard time convincing the committee about the value of his bill? It seems to me that he ought to be able to get that bill reported and have the Speaker arrange recognition here and have it passed very quickly.

Mr. SWING. No one knows better than the gentleman from Texas that the fact that a proposition has merit is no assurance of it being adopted.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I was not speaking about the Swing-Johnson bill. I was speaking about the new bill that the gentleman has to provide Congress with air-mail service.

Mr. SWING. Very well. I am glad to have the gentleman's support in the matter.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Has there not been some delay even about getting his great bill, the Swing-Johnson bill, reported?

Mr. SWING. I think that will come before the House in due and proper time. At least, I have that assurance. I bespeak for this infant industry, in which we all have faith, such support as we can properly give it. The country is air-minded and wants this new enterprise to succeed, and we should do our part.

In Europe the governments actually subsidize their air-mail routes. I do not ask that, the private contractors do not ask that, nor does the Post Office Department ask it. It is not necessary but the least that we can do is to officially recognize the air mail by using it ourselves on all proper occasions.

Mr. BLANTON. If I understood the gentleman, yesterday he was up in the air with Colonel Lindbergh and came back and immediately put this bill in the basket. Did he get this idea while up in the air?

Mr. SWING. Yes, the idea was given a strong impetus by that ride. I wish more Members of Congress would fly, because it brings home to them in the most convincing manner the fact that aviation and transportation by air is a reality and that its development is moving forward rapidly every year. We ought not to wait until the pioneering has all been done and the country covered with routes before giving this service our tardy recognition. We ought not to trail along in the rear of private business. Our Government ought to lead in worth-while causes. True, we have spent over $15,000,000 to lay out and start these routes, all the more reason why we ought to patronize them. At the proper time I hope my bill will come before the House and receive your whole-hearted support.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, the two gentlemen who have preceded me have spoken, one of national origins and the other of Colonel Lindbergh. I would like to say a few words on both subjects.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yesterday morning brought the information that the Senate has just passed a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 113) postponing for one year the application of the national-origins provision in the present immigration act.

Mr. Chairman, I am mindful of the rules of the House which forbid criticism of the upper body of Congress, and I shall conform to that rule. But this I do say: If this House shall adopt a similar resolution, or the same resolution, its Members who are responsible for that action will be guilty of the most cowardly act performed during the present administration.

If this resolution is enacted, what will be the reason? Stating the case in plain, unembellished English that no one needs misunderstand, it is because we have a presidential election in the fall. There is not a Member of the House who does not know this.

What sane person can find any other reason for postponing action on the repeal of the national-origins provisions? I have no quarrel with the person who favors this provision. I merely disagree with him. But I demand an opportunity to vote for or against this repeal, and to have that opportunity now. And I say without the slightest hesitancy that the person who does not dare to face this proposition now is not the clever and adroit political maneuverer he imagines himself, but is an evader of issues and one who tempers principles according to policy. Such procedure not only is indefensible and unworthy of representatives of the citizens of this Nation, but it also leaves an admittedly inaccurate and undependable, unscientific plan to be passed upon later, and, perhaps, if the rather transparent plan of the administration is successful, to be carried into effect when political pressure is less forceful and dangerous.

Legislators and executives who can not debate and act on this problem on its merits now, I repeat, are admitting the weakness and the impracticability of this plan, even while they assure themselves that this is a most excellent piece of political strategy. That applies, whether that person be domiciled in the White House, whether he be a member of the Cabinet, or a Member of Congress. With the administration organization to support them, they know that the many opponents of the national-origins plan will of necessity have to support their resolution to postpone its operation another year, if that is the only resolution that can reach a vote. Yes, even the chairmen of committees stand relatively helpless.

Why postpone action on this important legislation one year or more? We have had the estimates of the would-be experts sent us through the three Secretaries of executive departments whose task is was to prove the reliability of the statistics and compuations upon which this plan is based. We have studied them for more than a year, during which time these experts have also studied and computed.

A few days ago we were favored with another guess by these same experts, apparently intended to throw a sop to the nations discriminated against in this monstrosity called the national-origins plan. That report designating the plan, unsupportable by documentary and statistical evidence, confirms the inevitable conclusion that this plan can never be justified by such methods or by any other fair and intelligent reasoning. If we wait yet another year, undoubtedly we shall be favored with another guess made under the guise of scientific investigation.

Let us have done with this equivocation. If we who want to prevent this unscientific, silly piece of legislation from becoming the law of the land are defeated by a majority vote in this House, we will accept the verdict and bow before that majority. But let us face the proposition as men and not dodge aside from it and conceal ourselves under the shelter of an ambiguous vote until the oncoming storm of the presidential election shall have passed.

Let me add right here—although it should not be necessary—that we who oppose this provision do so wholly and solely in the interest of our Nation and our country.

Obviously, I have no time to discuss the immigration problem—and it is a problem—or the national-origins provision in the act of 1924. Nor is it necessary. The hearings before the Committees on Immigration in both Houses of Congress and hundreds upon hundreds of pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD these last four years furnish ample material for anyone desirous of acquainting himself with the facts. In passing, I again want to call the attention of my colleagues to a table prepared by a statistician of repute and renown, Doctor Norlie, which I inserted in the RECORD on January 17 of this year; a table which, with other data, furnishes food for thought to any unbiased mind.

To-day I have but one suggestion to make.

The debate on the immigration bills during the last few years became at times somewhat bitter. The atmosphere was surcharged with rancor and prejudice, the air was filled with epithets of "foreigners," "aliens," and the like, with all the implications conveyed by those terms. The accusation was made in so many words that those who opposed certain provisions of the proposed immigration laws were "not many generations removed from Europe," and hence very un-American, to put it mildly.

The finest and noblest type of American manhood to-day, the ideal of American youth, the best-loved man in the world, and the most valuable life in the United States to-day, Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, is not only "not many generations removed from Europe," but is the son of an immigrant, proud of his American citizenship, but also justly proud of his Swedish ancestry and heritage. If the proposed guesswork legislation had been the law of the land some years ago, in all likelihood Colonel Lindbergh would not have been born in America.

The Lone Eagle is flying over the Nation's Capital these days, carrying as passengers Members of Congress and their families. Many of us have already made the delightful trip with this pilot, having no misgivings as to our safety and security in his care. Many others will avail themselves of the coveted opportunity. My suggestion is this: That on to-morrow or Saturday the Members of the Immigration Committees of both Houses of Congress who favor the actual operation of the national-origins plan be given a special trip by Colonel Lindbergh, in order that they may have the privilege of even closer contact with this man, an example of the class of people that are having the door shut in their face by this provision that proposes to reduce by nearly two-thirds the annual immigration from Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Germany, and the Irish Free State, and open wide the gates to the inhabitants of the little island to the west of the North Sea who do not make use of the quota now allotted to them.

And this further suggestion, ironically made by Skandinaven of Chicago, in which I most heartily concur, might be repeated here, that, when we come to vote on the provision, Colonel Lindbergh be invited to circle about the Capitol in his Spirit of St. Louis. What a picture! Might we then open wide the windows, in order that the drone of the motor of the plane piloted by this finest type of American manhood might mingle with our ayes and noes as we vote on whether or not to bar from our shores this type of citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota yields back one minute.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on the night of February 28, 1928, in the Mayflower Hotel, was held the National Conference on Law Enforcement. Leading men from over the United States attended. Representatives of all of the churches of the United States were there; some of the leading men in all the churches. At that conference Bishop McDowell presided. Never have there been finer speeches anywhere on law enforcement. The Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, of Brooklyn, delivered a splendid address; similar addresses were made by Bishop Cannon and Bishop Freeman and others of distinguished note.

I believe that the greatest address, one of the greatest I heard, was delivered by one of the leading Catholics of America, Dr. John A. Lapp, professor of sociology in the Marquette University, of Milwaukee, Wis.; a splendid address. I intend now to read that address into the RECORD. It seemed to be the consensus of opinion that night that Doctor Lapp's address ought to be preserved in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. And I am going to preserve it. They were all short addresses. For fear I might want to use a little of my time in comment, and might not be able to read all of it within my 20 minutes, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that should I not finish it I may incorporate all of it in the RECORD, and also the brief mention in "Who's Who in America" of Dr. John A. Lapp.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert an item concerning Rev. Dr. John A. Lapp from "Who's Who" and such portion of his address as may not be read, as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no record of accomplishment and achievement in "Who's Who In America" finer than that credited to Dr. John A. Lapp.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. I think it should be understood that the gentleman he has referred to is not a clergyman.

Mr. BLANTON. No. He is a publicist and educator of the first water.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that he was a prominent clergyman.

Mr. BLANTON. Not all who attended that conference are clergymen. I attended it myself. I did mention some bishops of various denominations, which misled the Chair. The address is as follows:

THE CONSTITUTION VERSUS THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC

[Address delivered at the February Conference on Law Enforcement, February 28, 1928, by Dr. John A. Lapp, of Marquette University]

"I do solemly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." On the 4th of March, 1929, a citizen of this Republic will stand before the populace with one hand on the Bible and the other hand upraised to God and repeat that solemn oath. Representatives and Senators, members of the State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the States, will make a similar declaration and take a similar oath on the assumption of office.

What does it signify to take an oath? An oath is "a solemn appeal to God, to some revered person, or thing in attestation of the truth of a statement or the binding character of a promise." In a community where ethical ideas prevail the oath of office of the President of the United States and of representative officials of State and Nation should be sufficient to secure the preservation of the Constitution and the enforcement of laws. Can it be that any man worthy of holding high office would deliberately fail to fulfill such a solemn promise? Can it be that any considerable portion of the people have sunk so low that they would choose high officials knowing that those officials would deliberately break their oath of office? Can it be that virtue is dead among the populace so that oaths have lost their binding character and that men will be applauded for the defiance of that virtue without which social cohesion and civil government could not exist?

We are assembled to-night to make a simple demand to the political parties in this Republic. We are not seeking favors. We are not humble supplicants petitioning for the acceptance of our views upon a great public question. We do not ask the adoption of a new policy. We are offering nothing that is new or strange. We come with a simple demand that the Constitution of the United States shall be obeyed. We do not supplicate. We do not fawn at the seats of power. We are not here to express a wish nor are we here to admonish. We come supported and upheld by the majesty of the Constitution of the United States to demand that one of its provisions, put there by the most overwhelming majority that any of its important provisions was ever accorded, either originally or by amendment, shall be obeyed. We demand of the political parties and their candidates for all offices, from the highest to the lowest, that they shall, when they take the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States, remember that that Constitution reads:

"The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes, is hereby prohibited."

Against the solemn obligations imposed by the Constitution and the oath of office what do we find as the alternative? We are asked to defy the Constitution for what? Public officials are being encouraged to nullify their oath of office to what end? The voters of the Republic are urged to support nullifiers of the Constitution for what purpose? Surely when citizens and voters and public officials are asked to defy the mandates of the supreme law of the land and to break their oath of office, there ought to be a cause higher than constitutions, higher, in fact, than anything human. But is it so? We are asked to defy the Constitution and encourage the nullification of solemn oaths in the interest of a low, sordid, contemptible, and outlaw business—the manufacture, sale, and transportation of liquor for beverage purposes. A prized charter of the human race is to be sacrificed in the interest of one of the lowest and vilest businesses that ever disgraced the conduct of human beings. The Constitution versus the liquor business! Contemplate the contrast. Contemplate the significance, if you will, of a public opinion expressed in votes that chooses to support liquor in preference to the fundamental law of the land. Surely when presented with the plain issue of "Constitution versus liquor," the moral sense of this country will have no difficulty of choice.

We forget, perhaps, the character of the business which the nullifiers now condone and would reinstate. For 10 years we have not known the open saloon. For 10 years the liquor business has been radically curbed. For 10 years the liquor traffic has not been able to flaunt itself. We are in danger of forgetting what it was that caused this overwhelming decision of the people to outlaw by a constitutional amendment the liquor business. May I take you back to the time before national prohibition became a fact, to the time when the liquor business trailed its sordid and venomous way? Let us see what this thing was against which the moral conscience of the people applied its tremendous power. I beg to read to you the words of one of the greatest leaders in the movement for prohibition, the late Hon. Frank Hanly, former Governor of Indiana. The indictment by this wholesome leader took the form of specific reasons for hating the liquor business.

"I bear no malice toward those engaged in the liquor business, but I hate the traffic.

"I hate its every phase.

"I hate it for its arrogance.

"I hate it for its commercialism; for its greed and avarice; for its sordid love of gain at any price.

"I hate it for its domination of politics; for its corrupting influence in civic affairs; for its incessant effort to debauch the suffrage of the country; for the cowards it makes of public men.

"I hate it for its utter disregard of law; for its ruthless trampling of the solemn compacts of State constitutions.

"I hate it for the load it straps to labor's back; for the palsied hands it gives to toil; for its wounds to genius; for the tragedies of its might-have-beens.

"I hate it for the human wrecks it has caused.

"I hate it for the almshouses it peoples; for the prisons it fills; for the insanity it begets; for its countless graves in potter's fields.

"I hate it for the mental ruin it imposes upon its victims; for its spiritual blight; for its moral degradation.

"I hate it for the crimes it commits; for the homes it destroys; for the hearts it breaks.

"I hate it for the malice it plants in the hearts of men; for its poison, for its bitterness, for the Dead Sea fruit with which it starves their souls.

"I hate it for the grief it causes womanhood—the scalding tears, the hopes deferred, the strangled aspirations, its burden of want and care.

"I hate it for its heartless cruelty to the aged, the infirm, and the helpless; for the shadow it throws upon the lives of children; for its monstrous injustice to blameless little ones.

"I hate it as Abraham Lincoln hated slavery, and as he sometimes saw in prophetic vision the end of slavery, and the coming of the time when the sun should shine and the rain should fall upon no slave in the Republic, so I sometimes seem to see the end of this unholy traffic, the coming of the time when, if it does not wholly cease to be, it shall find no safe habitation anywhere beneath Old Glory's stainless stars."

This is the business that we are asked to condone. It is this for which men are urged to break their oath of office. It is for this that the fundamental charter of America is to be breached. It is this which we are asked to support in its combat to undermine and destroy the Constitution. It is for this that people are to be encouraged in their sneers at the Constitution. This life and soul-destroying, conscience-breaking, lawless business we are asked to support in preference to the fundamental charter of the Republic. It shall not be. The liquor business has deserved all of the condemnation that has been expressed in torrents of righteous words and all of the repressions and prohibitions that have been placed upon it by statutes and constitutions. It doubly deserves them now, when outlawry has been solemnly expressed upon it. After a hundred years of fruitless effort to regulate the infamous conduct of the liquor traffic the people rose, and in one mighty effort, by the vote of 46 of the 48 States, placed their final seal of condemnation on it by enacting the eighteenth amendment.

The liquor business has never changed its character. It can not change. It appeals to the baser elements. It is low and uses its influence to win the low. Wrapping itself in the garb of personal liberty and civil rights, it seeks to confuse substantial citizens. As though the right to drink and get drunk and destroy the peace of one's family and the safety of the community were a personal liberty and a civil right! It appeals with holy unction against the saloon, putting all the blame for all the sordid history of liquor upon that institution, piously declaring that the saloon must not come back. Ah, my friends, let us not be deceived. The saloon is the center of the liquor business. It has always been so, and it always will be so. Mark well that if the liquor business comes back in America the saloon will come back.

If we are to have liquor, some one must sell it. The opponents of prohibition naïvely urge that the Government engage in dispensing liquor. Government ownership of the liquor business is the proposal coming from conservative men who do not believe even in public ownership of water works. They think such ownership would be socialistic, but they are not troubled about the corrupting business of liquor dispensing. The liquor business in the old days amounted to as much as $4,000,000,000 a year.

Think of conservatives who do not believe in public management of public utilities actually approving Government management of liquor to the extent of $4,000,000,000 a year. It is a high price they are willing to pay for the return of liquor. My own judgment is that such a proposition is a mere cover under which the saloon will return. Senator BORAH was right in saying that public management of liquor dispensing would rot the foundations of the Republic in a brief space of time.

There are no methods of management of liquor dispensing that have merit in logic, common sense, or decency. Certain it is that the Government of this country, which is founded for the purpose of promoting the general welfare, will not be allowed to engage in the disgusting business of dispensing liquor.

Realizing the hopelessness of the task of securing by orderly process a change in the Constitution of the country—for which they are welcome to strive—some supporters of the desperate business openly preach the violation of the Constitution and the laws enacted for its enforcement. It is such with which we have to contend to-day. It is to defy such that this meeting is held. It is to stand for the Constitution of the country against any lawless or anarchistic element that we set forth to-night our planks for law enforcement. We ask to-night that he who takes the oath of office as President of the United States in 1929, and all other public officials who are bound by oath to support the Constitution, shall repeat to the nullifiers in adopted form the famous declaration of Lincoln:

"You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the Constitution, while I have the most solemn one to preserve, protect, and defend it."

I want to show you who the man was who delivered that address before the Law Enforcement Conference. This is what "Who's Who In America" says of that leading distinguished Catholic of America, John A. Lapp. I read:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. That distinguished Catholic at this meeting of American citizens in the Mayflower Hotel on February 28, 1928, seeking the sole object of law enforcement in the United States, deserves at the hands of somebody this mention. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. LOWREY. You have quoted there the oath that the President takes, and the oath that we Members of Congress take, and the oath that the State legislator takes. I want to say that in my State I and every other citizen who registers to vote has to sign in pen and ink practically the same oath, and every citizen must take that same oath, as well as every public official.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GAMBRILL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my purpose in addressing the Committee of the Whole House at this time is to congratulate the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, having in charge the appropriation bill for the Navy Department, for the very commendable and comprehensible bill and report it has submitted.

It is to be regretted that the subcommittee did not deem it proper or desirable to include in the bill before us an appropriation of $250,000 to build a new boathouse at the Naval Academy at Annapolis to replace the two old sheds which for over 32 years have served for this purpose, but inadequately so. It is but fair to state that at the appropriate time I shall offer an amendment to the bill for an appropriation of $250,000 for this purpose, and I hope my amendment, or any other amendment of a similar character, will receive the sympathetic and careful consideration of the committee, which, I am confident, it will.

I am conscious of the fact that in not including in the Navy bill an appropriation for a new boathouse at Annapolis the subcommittee may have been influenced by the fact that authorization for this appropriation was lacking, and I have no disposition to quarrel with that subcommittee or to question its judgment. I can only express the hope that if an amendment of this character is offered no point of order will be made against it.

My main purpose in speaking at this time is to express, in particular, my hearty approval of the appropriation providing for the appointment of four midshipmen at Annapolis from each congressional district and four senatorial appointments instead of three, as at present. This action of the committee can be defended, if any defense be needed, both from the standpoint of the necessities of the service and the desirability of utilizing this splendid educational institution at Annapolis to its fullest extent.

It had been my hope that an appropriation would be made to provide for five midshipmen from each congressional district and the same number by senatorial appointment, but I feel we can well afford to defer to the judgment of the subcommittee having this bill in charge, and one would have to be hypercritical to find fault with the action of the subcommittee.

As I have said, the increase in the number of midshipmen is justified from two standpoints—the necessity of having additional officers for aviation and other purposes, and the desirability of using the great educational institution at Annapolis to its fullest extent so that the country may have the full benefit of its influence.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report for the fiscal year 1927, has pointed out that, while the present number of line officers is 5,499 (a number equal to 4 per cent of the enlisted strength of the Navy as authorized but not appropriated for—137,485 men), the increased size of submarines and destroyers, the greatly increased mechanism of propelling machinery and appliances for the control of gunfire, and especially the constantly enlarged demands of aviation for personnel, all combined, require a larger percentage of officers to enlisted men.

Admiral Leigh, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, who heartily approves of an increase in the number of midshipmen, and who appeared before the subcommittee on the naval academy of the Committee on Naval Affairs, made the interesting statement that we have not increased the number of line officers in the Navy since aviation became active. Also that aviation activities have drawn 425 line officers for duty, and by 1932, when the five-year aviation program has been completed and we have 1,000 serviceable planes, the Navy will require for this service 863 officers, and may need 1,000 in subsequent years.

If as many as 1,000 officers are drawn for aviation purposes, the line will then be only 4,499 officers instead of 5,499, as authorized. And, according to Admiral Leigh, this may decrease the line officers below the number required to man the ships. It is to be borne in mind that an appropriation for an increase now would not increase the officer strength until about 1932, having regard to the fact that the course at Annapolis is four years.

The average number of midshipmen to graduate, with three appointments, is from 274 to 300; with four appointments, the number to graduate would be about 335; and with five appointments, from 405 to 425. It is also to be borne in mind that about 45 officers are required each year for corps service, as follows:

Marine Corps	25
Supply Corps	8
Construction Corps	8
Civil Engineer Corps	4
Total	45

If the naval program for the construction of 15 additional cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier, authorization for which passed the House on Saturday last, is carried out, then we are confronted with an additional reason for making the appropriation now, so that the increase in officers may be felt by 1932 or 1933, when the new ships will begin to be commissioned.

But aside from the naval needs, as stated, there is every reason why the splendid institution at Annapolis should be utilized to its fullest capacity. No stronger justification for this statement can be made than to refer to the fact that every Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, since the reduction in the number of midshipmen was made, has recommended that the number be increased to the fullest capacity of the academy. Importance should be attached to these recommendations, as they have been made by Boards of Visitors composed of the most eminent educators of our country and by men occupying commanding positions in the industrial and commercial life of our country. Some of these boards, from whom these recommendations have come, have been composed of such men as Dr. S. W. Stratton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Dr. Frank P. Graves, president University of the State of New York; Daniel J. Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.; and John Hays Hammond, the great mining engineer.

The Board of Visitors for 1925 said, in part:

The capital outlay in the plan and equipment of the academy is too large to justify anything save use at maximum capacity, and there is demand in civil life, if not in the Navy itself, for all the men that Annapolis can graduate.

In 1927 the Board of Visitors made this report:

At the present time there is an attendance of midshipmen at the Naval Academy of about 1,600. The plant is sufficiently large and complete to take care of 2,400 men with only a relatively small increased expenditure for instructors and salaries of midshipmen. Since an increased attendance would enable more careful selection of final graduates, and such for whom vacancies in the line or staff of the Navy did not exist and who would be returned to civil life would form a valuable addition to the Navy in time of need, it would seem the part of wisdom that annual appropriations should be made sufficient to maintain the regiment of midshipmen at the maximum now provided by law; the status of each graduate to be that of a temporary ensign until after a two years' satisfactory service at sea, when a permanent commission shall be issued.

One could not find higher recommendations than these, or ones upon which Congress could place greater reliance, and it is very gratifying to find that the Subcommittee on Appropriations, having this bill in charge, has made provisions for an increase in the number of midshipmen.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MOORMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORMAN. Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen of the Committee: Having been here only a few months, I realize that I have not attained that experience and wisdom which would warrant my thrusting upon this body any opinions or convictions of my own, as worthy of consideration as fundamental; but, as an accredited Member of this Congress, charged with meeting and disposing of the problems of a district, I feel that when I conceive that the rights of those I represent, in justice and under existing rules and law, are ignored and trampled upon—I must speak, even if my first utterance here be one of seeming discord, and concerning that which some may consider an unimportant matter. Sometimes, I am impressed that due consideration of the individual is neglected; that we are prone to consider and attach too much importance to things and persons collectively, thereby losing sight of the importance of the basic unit, the individual, and his guaranteed rights and interests. Anyway, I am the intermediary here between a wronged Kentucky citizen and an Executive order of the President of the United States, and I unhesitatingly raise my voice in earnest yet respectful protest.

Abraham Lincoln was born in my district, not many miles from where my humble constituent, the subject of my remarks, lives. If Lincoln's great spirit could assert itself, if his never-failing ideas of justice and right could prevail in this matter, if he were in Washington now in the position he once adorned, I would approach him with confidence in the interest of this helpless citizen, and I would feel that I had the sympathetic ear of at least one great Kentuckian, American, and Republican. We gave him to the world, one of its towering men, and he became the acknowledged champion of the rights of the wronged. Can we so soon forget the things he said and the principles for which he stood? I am only asking for one that which he so freely gave to all—justice.

PROTEST FOR CONSTITUENT

To illustrate what goes on now in Kentucky in Lincoln's old district, where practically every Democratic postmaster has been removed for political reasons, and often without cause, I desire to read into the RECORD my written protest filed in the Roy G. Adams case, as follows:

Hon. JOHN H. BARTLETT,

First Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have written Senator FREDERICK M. SACKETT a letter or two concerning the application of Roy G. Adams, of Rock Haven, Ky., in my district, for postmaster. I visited his office a time or two and saw him in the House one morning, for a moment. I appealed to him, in the name of justice, in the matter of letting the civil service take its course in this case. I have tried to be courteous, have never made any objection to anybody he suggested for appointment, nor have I endeavored to secure any appointment of a postmaster in my district, understanding the political practice in vogue. However, inasmuch as this boy is a cripple, inasmuch as the people desire his services, inasmuch as I started in to make an earnest protest, and knowing that not to appoint him is wholly wrong, I desire to talk to you and see if you would not let this boy go in on his merits. Senator SACKETT simply said he had to listen to the local Republicans. I wrote you on January 19 as follows:

"I am advised by you to-day that you are considering the appointment of a postmaster at Rock Haven, Ky., an office of the fourth class, from the following list of eligibles:

"Roy G. Adams.

"Mrs. Lula Hawkins.

"I would like to inquire when and how Mrs. Hawkins became an eligible to receive appointment for this office?

"When I have this information I would like to come down and talk to you about it before any action is taken."

Your response was:

"I have your letter of the 19th instant relative to the list of eligibles for postmaster at Rock Haven, Ky., concerning which you were advised under date of January 18, 1928. The Civil Service Commission held an examination for postmaster at Rock Haven, but was unable to secure a complete register of eligibles. The matter was referred to a post-office inspector for report on the suitability of applicants. An inspector submitted the names of Roy G. Adams and Mrs. Lula Hawkins as applicants.

"If you have any information concerning the suitability of either of the applicants mentioned which you think the department should consider in connection with their candidacy and will submit it to this bureau, it will be given careful consideration."

I called to see you some time ago but found you out. Later I saw you. I then went over to the Civil Service Commission and talked to Hon. William C. Deming, president of the Civil Service Commission, and Mr. D. H. Richards, of the application division. It was my desire and purpose to know just exactly the status of the case, as I do not desire to do anybody an injustice, but I propose to get to the bottom of it and ascertain just who is responsible for the rank injustice that is about to be perpetrated, under the guise and name of civil service, against one of my constituents. I requested a written statement of the facts from the Civil Service and have it, as follows:

"Referring to your personal call at this office concerning the fourth-class postmaster situation at Rock Haven, Ky., we have to advise you that examination was held for this office on March 19, 1927, in which Roy G. Adams was the only person who attained an eligible rating, although Mrs. Lula Hawkins was authorized to compete at the same time.

"Upon reporting the results of this examination to the Post Office Department, request was received from the department asking for a full certification of three eligibles. In order to satisfy such request the commission announced a second examination, which was held July 2, 1927. Joseph C. Hawkins and Mrs. Lula Hawkins were applicants, but the examination did not result in securing any additional eligibles. The name of Roy G. Adams was again certified to the Post Office Department as the only eligible on September 20, 1927.

"The regulations governing fourth-class postmaster examinations, as promulgated in Executive orders, provide that in the event that for any office there are less than three eligibles the commission may, in its discretion, authorize selection in the same manner as is provided for offices with annual compensation of less than $500. Such procedure consists in the Postmaster General directing a post-office inspector to visit the locality and to make report for appointment from among the persons filing application in the order of their fitness, such report to be based solely upon the relative suitability of the applicants and their ability to provide facilities for transacting the business of the office. The department is then requested to transmit to the Civil Service Commission a copy of the inspector's report showing the department's action thereon. Up to this time the commission has received no word from the Post Office Department as to its proposed action in appointing a postmaster at Rock Haven, nor has any copy of the inspector's report been received showing such investigation to have been made."

The situation in this case upon which I base my earnest protest of Mrs. Hawkins's appointment as postmaster is that Roy G. Adams and Mrs. Hawkins took an examination for postmaster on March 19, 1927. Adams made a grade of 74.60 per cent, and she failed to become an eligible, only making 38.70 per cent. For political reasons another examination was held. Mrs. Hawkins took it on July 2, 1927, and again failed to become an eligible, only making 35.20 per cent. For political reasons objection was made to Adams, and he was not appointed. I have Senator SACKETT'S statement that the Republican county chairman would not indorse Adams, and that the Republican organization indorsed Mrs. Hawkins. Adams has a long petition of the best people, Republicans and Democrats; no citizen makes any tenable objection to him, nor to the place where he would keep the office, nor to his character or acts as assistant postmaster while he served in the same place for the preceding four years. Notwithstanding these examinations and the fact that the people desired this man, a post-office inspector was sent, presumably to make this woman an eligible, whom the civil service by examination had twice adjudged ineligible. The inspector's report, according to notice from your office, made Mrs. Hawkins eligible, notwithstanding her husband's one and her two failures to qualify. These are peculiar gyrations of the civil service, or is unquestionably post-office hocus-pocus, or is an inexcusable political interference with majority rule, civil service, and common justice. The post-office inspector sent down there must have been a fair and worthy gentleman. Under the circumstances I would say that he acted with caution and care in reporting his conclusions. While his report did place Mrs. Hawkins on the eligible list, yet he frankly prefers Mr. Adams over Mrs. Hawkins in his report, and also says that the place Adams would keep the office is preferable. If there had been anything at all wrong with Adams your inspector would have reported it.

This is not all. Floyd Patterson, who formerly kept the office and under whom Adams served in the same building for four years, has made an application to be reinstated as postmaster, having been out less than a year. I am informed that Patterson also does not meet with the approval of the Republican county committee, and that he is therefore persona non grata to the powers that be. Just why a worthy gentleman—who is a cripple, but not to the extent of in any degree interfering with the discharge of his duties, who has made the best grade under so-called civil service, and who is experienced and desired by the patrons—should not be appointed is more than I can see. If this situation is permitted to become the basis of Mrs. Hawkins's appointment, I respectfully ask you to tell me why the appointment is made and who is responsible for it? Am I not, as a representative of these people, entitled to answer in writing? From the Civil Service Commission I would like to know why they desired more eligibles? Adams had been good enough for four years. Do they always require a full list?

I am writing this after notice from Senator SACKETT's office that he is going to recommend Mrs. Hawkins, notwithstanding my protests and the facts. You have agreed to hold up the appointment until my protest is filed.

I understand there was appropriated in 1927 over $1,000,000 for civil service. We are implored now for reclassification of the employees, and other such matters claim our attention, and the taxpayers of my district help foot the bills. For what? To interfere with local determination of local matters? To hold out to the people that if they study and pass examinations and qualify themselves they will receive square deals and then help euchre them out of their rights? To furnish a scheme of polite and official legerdemain to make possible the exercise of the will of the political boss? I desire to tell the people who have appealed to me to fight this outstanding injustice and also desire to tell the people of the whole country what kind of political outrages are being perpetrated under the so-called civil service. If it is the desire of the administration and the purpose of the law to have Senators name postmasters on an open and frank basis, amen! Otherwise let us have civil service in fact in dealing with fourth-class postmasters, unhampered by politics and therefore more efficient.

The present system is a mockery, engenders lack of confidence and respect in governmental agency, and amounts to a national farce. If I stood for this inexcusable miscarriage of justice, unpardonable political fake, and unjustified civil-service contortion without protest I would not be worthy to represent my people. Whatever the thing is to which they apply the misnomer Executive order, I have no respect for it if invoked to whitewash and make effective the unwarranted procedure in this case. I desire to know the excuse given and the authority for making this order. Whatever happens, I desire to thank you and the other gentlemen mentioned for the personal courtesy extended me in dealing with the matter.

I am sending copy hereof to Senator SACKETT and the Civil Service Commission in protest of the suggested appointment. This is a small matter, but great principles are involved.

Sincerely,

HENRY D. MOORMAN.

FEBRUARY 20, 1928.

[Applause.]

OFFICIAL RESPONSES

Answering my letter of protest, the United States Civil Service Commission, on March 3, wrote me, from which I quote, as follows:

If this system is a "mockery," it rests with Congress and the President to strengthen it and to require, as did President Roosevelt, that in all appointments of fourth-class postmasters and rural carriers that the highest eligible shall receive the appointment.

Your letter indicated your belief that the objections to the eligible are political. Of course, political consideration should be disregarded in appointments to the classified service. Usually they are so veiled that they are difficult to establish. If it can be clearly shown that an appointment is in fact based upon political considerations, the commission would have authority in the matter, as the civil service rules require that selection for appointment shall be made with sole reference to merit and fitness.

On March 9, Hon. John H. Bartlett, First Assistant Postmaster General, responding to mine of February 20, after giving the favored applicant nearly 20 days in which to get in her alleged petition, said:

Your letter came several days ago in my absence, but it has now been brought to my attention. You wrote about the Rock Haven postmaster appointment regarding which you talked with me some time ago.

I have received a rather lengthy petition, which is said to be signed by patrons of the Rock Haven post office, asking for the appointment of Mrs. Hawkins as postmaster and saying also that during the time she has been serving as acting postmaster she has given good service.

You will recall that the inspector who made the investigation in regard to the candidates for postmaster reported that he found that Mrs. Hawkins as acting postmaster maintained the office in a neat and tidy condition and that the records of the office were well kept.

The department is disposed to appoint Mrs. Hawkins.

SENATOR FAILS TO MAKE DENIALS

Senator SACKETT, to this hour, has not done me the courtesy of making a response, nor himself the justice of making any denial. Why? In the first place, the gentleman knows that the order and rule governing the selection of postmasters is as stated in the commission's letter to me, which is incorporated in my protest, as follows:

The Postmaster General will direct a post-office inspector to visit the locality and make report for appointment from among the persons filing application, in the order of their fitness. Due notice of such visit will be made in the locality to be visited. Such report will be basely solely upon the relative suitability of the applicants and their ability to provide proper facilities for transacting the business of the office.

Neither the Postmaster General nor the commissioner denies that the inspector's report favors Mr. Adams over Mrs. Hawkins both as to suitability of applicants and ability to provide facilities for transacting the business of the office. The inspector's report governs, not an alleged "post-mortem" petition. I challenge the genuineness of the petition, on authority of Mr. Adams, which General Bartlett himself says: "is said to be signed by patrons, etc.," and demand an investigation by him of this feature. Hiding behind this petition, if genuine, would be only a subterfuge.

COMMISSION HAS POWER AND RESPONSIBILITY

In the second place, nobody denies my charge that politics is dominating the situation, even overriding rules, law, and the inspector's report. Anybody knows that both the Postmaster General and Senator SACKETT would have resented the statements of my protest—by vehement denials—had I not stated indisputable truths. The commissioner's own words to me, in response to my protest are:

If it can be clearly shown that an appointment is in fact based on political consideration, the commission would have authority in the matter, as the civil-service rules require that selection for appointment shall be made with sole reference to merit and fitness.

This procedure started under civil service, the president of the commission was told by me, personally, that it was political; my protest recites the details, nobody denies it, so how can civil service escape notice of and blame for such a situation when admittedly clothed with the authority above indicated? Thousands of rank cases could be cited by Members.

CIVIL-SERVICE ADMISSIONS

Further evidencing what appeals to me as an indictment against political domination of the civil-service system, Mr. Herbert E. Morgan, of the Civil Service Commission, appearing before the Census Committee on January 12, 1928, as shown by the committee's hearings, page 25, being questioned by me, and others, as to soldier preference and other kindred matters, when referring to fourth-class postmasters and rural carriers in part, said:

It is a well-known fact that the Post Office Department consults a Member of Congress or other distributor of patronage in the Territory affected as to the person to be selected. Frequently, and I may say almost usually, some one is selected in advance, with the hope that he will be rated among the high three.

Another statement:

It is a fact that politics usually controls in rural-carrier appointments (p. 26, hearings).

Further:

The system of appointments to presidential postmasterships has done more to discredit the Civil Service Commission and the merit system as a principle than anything that has occurred in my 25 years with the Government (p. 27).

A Member said:

So far as civil service is concerned in connection with appointments in my territory, it is a farce (p. 27).

Mr. Morgan's response was:

I quite agree with you, not only as to that district but every other district in the presidential class (p. 28).

Investigation has convinced me that civil service is being imposed on by the Post Office and the executive departments of the Government. The throng that recently stormed the Capitol, earnestly pleading for what they think due, had better also direct their attention and petitions to the preservation of the true principles of civil service if the system is to survive its present misuse. In my State nearly every appointment is accompanied by some political chicanery if simple justice is the true basis and real civil service the guide.

DOES CULPABILITY CREATE INDECISION?

Notwithstanding the facts and protest, the same "two-examination," disqualified Republican applicant was recommended by Senator SACKETT, and General Bartlett says:

The department is disposed to appoint Mrs. Hawkins.

In other words, after the expense of two civil-service examinations, and the further expense and pretense of sending an inspector down there to report other eligibles, none were reported, and Senator SACKETT's indorsement was made between the two who took the original examination, and he turned down the inspector's choice, with four years' experience, for a disqualified novice.

It is a common practice and subterfuge to permit such "acting postmasters" to hold on. This the senatorially indorsed holder of Roy G. Adams's rightful position may do, judging from the uncertain state of General Bartlett's mind. I have not been further advised in the premises by him. His failure to act would only be another official denial of rights. However, we all know that if the recommended Republican should finally lose, it will be because of this protest. Further, if the nominated Republican wins, it will only be running true to form—evidencing an utter disregard of merit and justice—and will result in a further detraction from the respect due proper governmental function.

CIVIL SERVICE OR SPOILS SYSTEM

Such bureaucratic despotism, sanatorial dictation, and executive highbinding are intolerable in a free government, in the face of civil-service rules and theories. Such action, and the juggling process between these agencies, contravenes every principle of square dealing; and I submit civil service should either be fairly administered as a respected system or dispensed with as a subterfuge, and let such appointments be altogether political.

DIFFERENCE IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

In theory the civil service has certain elements and principles which we all respect. Honestly and fairly administered, and its action respected by the departments and others in authority, most of us approve its general purpose. However, judging from the thousands of reported complaints over the country and conditions in my State, and the repeated and insistent complaints from my district, the present administration is unfairly partisan, palpably misleading, and deplorably disappointing. The system publishes to the world notices, rules, and regulations that invite widows, teachers, cripples, and all others to abandon and neglect their present means of earning a livelihood to prepare for and take examinations for civil-service positions. The implied agreement is that the best qualified person will win. The facts are, however, that merit, whether based on experience, education, or general efficiency, if not possessed by an approved member of the party in power, is often cast aside when the voice of the local political boss is heard.

The expressed will of a community is ruthlessly ignored and a clear-cut fraud is perpetrated by the joint operation of well-paid, overorganized, malfunctioning governmental agencies, the so-called civil-service and Post Office administrations, under Executive orders. My criticism is directed to the political phases as practiced in post-office selections, but the whole system and its personnel will ultimately suffer for the patent injustices perpetrated in this connection. The thousands of men and women under civil service who have observed its rules and rendered faithful service should not have their system brought into disrepute by its improper use by others.

COMPLAINT NATION-WIDE

When I began to receive many protests from my people, as a new Member I conferred with many Democratic Congressmen, whose judgment I respected because they had had long service. The unhappy and humiliating experiences of my own constituents, I find, are the same that deluded aspirants for many civil-service positions are having all over the United States. Since, I have advised many honest Democratic men and women that it meant nothing under present-day civil service to stand an examination and make the highest grade; but they naturally and properly seem to have faith in the pretended fairness and supposed justice of civil service. I am tired of trying to explain this deceitful and farcical system and departmental juggling process, and I take this occasion and means of exposing and denouncing it that my constituents and the country may know the facts. This criticism is neither meant to be personal nor partisan; is intended to be constructive, not destructive; but only as an indictment of what I believe to be organized wrong and systematized injustice. If it conforms to the orders and policies of the President, it is so much the worse therefor.

In the Census Committee we are working on a bill, H. R. 393, which contains a clause giving preference to veterans in the taking of the next census. Over 100,000 people will be employed under it, and it is proposed that 10,000 of them be under civil service. Preference for veterans is now elsewhere provided—one, an average of a small per cent; but, what difference would it make if even 50 per cent is added to a soldier's rating, if he happens to be a Democrat, and there is any kind of a Republican also applying? The answer: A few words in the form of a sophistic statement. Votes and respect of service men should not be had by such deception. They are real men, with brains, rights, and principles, neither dupes nor beggars, and should be treated as the law intended. Civil service and post-office administration should either give them what is intended and represented to be given, if thought deserved, or make no further legislative or administrative pretenses to giving the service men these preferences. He now often fails of appointment even if he has the highest grade on examination; frequently because of his politics, sometimes to reward some pie-hungry favorite of some politician.

CIVIL SERVICE MISUSED BY ADMINISTRATION

But this ambidextrous handmaid of the party in power, civil service, if a tool, is unnecessary; if a real functioning system, it should assert itself in this case by challenging the deceptive and inconsistent practices, and thereby deserve the respect and confidence of those paying for it; and, if the people, if I, if you Democratic Congressmen, passively stand for the present shameful political misuse of this system by the Post Office Department and the President, we are all guilty of suffering indefensible wrongs to those we represent. Too, we are further recognizing and surrendering to the arrogance of departmental dictation and bureaucratic centralized administration by overgrown creatures of Congress. And yet we daily continue to delegate our powers to others to a degree almost alarming.

President Wilson observed the true principles of civil service to the disadvantage of thousands of loyal members of his party. President Roosevelt required that the highest eligible on the list be given the appointment. President Coolidge, the administration under him, in return for this consideration, now uses governmental agencies to discriminate against worthy Democrats and deliberately ignores recognized civil-service principles—all of which constitutes the meanest kind of a spoils system, the very thing civil service was intended to replace and prevent.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, the size of the House to-day suggests the size of the Navy after the Republicans got through with it. You know, it never pays in any walk of life to be anything but yourself. I made a mistake last week. I strayed from the beaten path and made the tragic error of trying to defend the President of the United States, and like every other defender of the President of the United States, I was left out on a limb, and I could not get one Republican to come and help me with my amendment, which sought to make the Navy look something like what it ought to be under the 5–5–3 ratio. Somehow or other I could not even get time to talk about the amendment. I just do not know what happened, but I am from New York and we from New York seem to understand when we are getting what we call the "works." I was shut off from debate last week, and I want to thank this committee for giving me an opportunity to discuss the Navy in a rather general way.

In discussing the Navy one must necessarily discuss peace and war and in discussing peace and war one must necessarily say something about history and do a little research work. So I have dug up an ancient document. It is called "Honest in Government," and it is otherwise known as the Republican platform of 1924. I want to read just a couple of paragraphs from it.

His conception and successful direction of the Limitation of Armament Conference in Washington was an achievement which measurably advanced the world along the path toward peace.

That is a reference to President Harding. Here is the promise of the Republicans concerning the Navy.

We pledge ourselves to round out and maintain the Navy to the full strength provided the United States by the letter and spirit of the conference on limitation of armament.

And here is their final and closing clause in their contract with the American people.

In urging the people to elect a Republican President and Vice President we asked them to elect to the Senate and House of Representatives, men and women who believe in the Republican principles, acknowledge party responsibility, and who can be relied upon to keep faith with the people by carrying out the platform which the Republican Party now presents and pledges itself to fulfill.

Last week I offered an amendment suggested by the Navy Department and suggested by the President to bring up the Navy to the 5–5–3 ratio promised by this document but not a Republican stood on his feet to support the amendment, indeed, the Republicans tried, by ways that are know to Members of this House, to see that I should not even debate the amendment. Well, that is not important. It only affects me personally but it is important that this Navy of ours has shrunk to such a low state that the Secretary of the Navy has seen fit to officially report that we only have a second-class Navy, and this party that came into power on the platform is responsible for the situation. I now charge there has been a complete falldown of administration by the Republican Party as far as the Navy is concerned.

Now, I supported the President, but he did not support himself. Nobody can tell me that if he wanted this program presented by the Secretary of the Navy he could not have done something with this House. If he wants something stopped over here he can get it stopped. He did not care much about a congressional inquiry into the 8–4 disaster, and nothing has been done concerning that type of inquiry. So I believe he still has influence with other Members of the House outside of myself.

Now, what did he say about the situation in his message to Congress? He said:

We can plan for the future and begin a moderate building program.

It needs aircraft development, it needs submarines, it needs airplane carriers, and a material addition to its force of cruisers.

And what else did he say? He said:

We should refrain from no needful program.

It should especially be demonstrated that propaganda will not cause us to change our course.

There was some little discussion to-day about propaganda. Here is a piece of propaganda I received on the Navy, and it is practically the only piece of propaganda I received. It is the message of the President of the United States. The Republican leader [Mr. TILSON] said, on the propaganda question, that we ought to provide larger wastebaskets in which to throw this literature, but I want to know what propaganda influenced the Republican Party and influenced the President to desert the Navy at this time, especially in view of his statement that propaganda would not be permitted to have him change his course.

Propaganda has had a material effect on the White House, has had a material effect on the Republican side of this House and to a great extent on the Democratic side of the House as far as the Navy is concerned, and the suggestion of the gentleman that this propaganda be investigated is not a bad suggestion at all.

Last year the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in talking against the naval bill made a rather unpleasant reference to the gentleman who represents districts having navy yards, indicating that their motive for advocating a large navy might be due to local interests. I find now by a very careful reading of the very elaborate hearings held by this committee on the naval appropriation bill that even to Mr. BURTON of Ohio, great pacifist and international statesman, national defense is to a certain extent a local issue because he appeared before the committee just like the common herd of Congressmen when they are coming in advocating something for their district and he had this to say, Mr. FRENCH introducing him:

Mr. FRENCH. We have with us Representative BURTON. We shall be glad to hear from you, Mr. BURTON.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I am more in favor of construction of aircraft than I am of cruisers. I think that squares more with the developments for the future, and it squares more with what would be useful alike in peace and in war. It seems to me that this proposition to build two ships at a cost of $8,000,000, while one costs $5,500,000, is a rational one, and I should favor it and vote for it on the floor of the House.

Now, I have been trying to find out something about these airships and where they are built. I got a little suspicious of the situation when I found it was almost unanimous on the part of Ohio that it would be in the interest of the Navy to have airships, and I rather suspected that the Goodyear Rubber Co. was a little interested in airship building, and I think this squares accounts with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio as to the so-called navy yard Congressmen.

Now, what has happened since the disarmament conference? First let me read you the original American proposal at the disarmament conference:

The use of capital-ship tonnage as the measurement of strength for navies and a proportionate allowance of auxiliary combatant craft prescribed.

This was subdivision (D) of the main classification of the American proposal, and it clearly contemplated that whatever ratio happened to be arrived at as to capital ships, there should be a proportionate arrangement, either by treaty or by independent operations of the governments involved, to maintain the battleship ratio relative as well to the auxiliary craft.

Now, we have not done this, and yet our friends at Cleveland told the country that if we would only elect these gentlemen, this honest Republican Party, with party regularity, they would live up to this 5–5–3 ratio. And by the way, they used to make a lot of noise about the disarmament treaty, but I do not think you will find much about it in the President's message of 1927.

Now, what has happened generally throughout the world on shipbuilding? Since the Washington conference the United States has built just 19 war vessels of a total tonnage of 157,000 tons. Great Britain has built 57 war vessels of a total tonnage of 338,000 tons. Japan has built 127 war vessels of a total tonnage of 407,000 tons. In merchant ships the United States has built 18 of a total tonnage of 195,000 tons. Great Britain has built 882 of a total tonnage of over 4,000,000 tons. Japan has built 75 of a total tonnage of 335,000 tons, and this is the maritime record of this country on which the Republican Party must go before the country at the coming election.

Now, what was the net result of the Washington disarmament conference?

Mr. Gardiner, a well known Navy expert, has this to say:

The net result of all of this was that where the United States had sought a comprehensive limitation of fleets it secured the limitation only of capital ships and of aircraft carriers, leaving all powers free to build as large a number and volume of cruisers, flotilla leaders, destroyers, submarines, etc., as each might choose. And this fraction of success, that involved the destruction of the better half of the American capital fleet, the United States was obliged to purchase by further agreeing to hold in their inadequate status quo our insular fortifications and naval bases west of the Hawaiian Islands and Alaska, as by Article XIX of the naval treaty.

Now, there are gentlemen who say in a very positive, absolutely final, conclusive and ipse dixit fashion that war with England is unthinkable, and yet they are all talking about it and all thinking about it, and they are all comparing relative naval strengths. The best answer to this suggestion, I have found, is in the English Review of 1921 in a statement of a British writer:

It is easy to declare roundly that a war between this country and America is unthinkable. That statement argues nothing so much as imaginative incapacity on the part of the sentimentalist who makes it.

The gentleman from Texas this afternoon spoke about our oath under the Constitution. There is no part of the Constitution more binding on this Congress and on the President than that requiring us to keep up the national defense, and I say when the Navy Department and the President say we are maintaining a second-class Navy, when they say we are not maintaining a 5–5–3 Navy, and when the Naval Affairs Committee and this committee come in without recommending provisions for a 5–5–3 Navy, they are false to the Constitution of the United States, and there could be no more effective way of nullifying the Constitution than by falling down on the national defense, and incidentally, I may say, that one of the very things that has brought about a failure of national defense is the large amount of money we have spent on the pet project of the gentleman from Texas, to wit, prohibition.

If we had used the money we have thrown away in our efforts to close a few saloons and substitute 3,000 speakeasies in Washington, D. C., and appropriated it to national defense, we could very easily maintain a Navy equal to that, if not superior to, any nation in the world.

Now, I have no quarrel with those who say that they are for peace. We are all for peace. Some think we can get it by not having any arms. Some think we can get it by having a strong defensive system. Others trust in Christianity. Damascus trusted to Christianity, and the people of Damascus were showered with shells from French battleships.

The League of Nations did not say a word. The people of Nanking trusted in Christianity, and they were stormed by bullets and shells, and the great League of Nations did not have a word to say.

Only yesterday the State Department reported that in 1914 we were at the point of dangerous friction with Great Britain over the interpretation of regulations governing the freedom of the seas, and only by the great finesse of the Wilson Cabinet did we avert war in 1914 protesting to Great Britain that she was exceeding her rights under the declaration of London.

There are some who make a great deal about the cost of national defense. The chairman of the subcommittee in start-out said this was the largest and most expensive program we had had since the limitation of armaments.

The United States is spending per capita about $6 a year on the national defense, and Great Britain is spending about $16 a year on national defense.

I understand from an article by Capt. Dudley Knox, an American expert, that the upkeep of the Navy does not cost us 1 per cent of the Navy-protected trade. In the light of that, those who are against national defense in the interest of economy are entirely inaccurate in their position.

Another strange thing about the situation is this flimflam by the Republican Party in trying to mislead the American people on the Navy. The Naval Committee comes in and says we do not need authorization for submarines, we do not need authorization for destroyer leaders, because it already exists. This committee which should coordinate with the Committee on Naval Affairs has brought in a bill without anything in it for new submarines, and nothing in it for destroyer leaders.

Mr. SCHAFER. There are Democrats on the committee.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes; and I find fault with them, too. But the Democrats are not charged with the responsibility. They did not write the platform that I have read, either, contracting the American people.

There was subtle appeal made here by a pacifist. They say that those who want a large Navy are arguing for war. The most insidious subtle appeal was made here by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER]. He said if we were to have war we would march on Canada. Just imagine that in these dry days what an insidious appeal that is to people in the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Missouri is a Democrat.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes; and he is the only one that said a sensible thing—outside of myself. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, a few nights ago I attended an initiation banquet by the Gamma Eta Gamma law fraternity of Georgetown University. I was made an honorary member some years ago. A number of Members of the House and of the Senate have been enrolled by this great fraternity as honorary members. Senator DALE, Representative ROY FITZGERALD, Representative GIBSON, distinguished members of the bench and bar and of the faculty of Georgetown University were present. Some of the best speeches that I have heard in a long time were made on that night. It was during the initiation work, which is of the highest order of excellence, that it occurred to me it would be in the interest of the public welfare for some one to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that part of the ritual which contains lectures on the common law, the civil law, and on equity. The three lectures are very short, and I am quite sure will be read with interest by every law student and lover of legal literature that may be lucky enough to find them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I would suggest to those that have an interest in the matter that they read the forty-fourth chapter of Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. That chapter has been pronounced to be a liberal education in itself on the laws of the mighty empire which have held spellbound the intellect and the imagination of the millions and millions that have pored over their wisdom since that mighty alluring and enchanting fabric went stumbling and tottering to its destruction:

JUDEX' LECTURE ON THE COMMON LAW

(Composed by Ernest C. Butler, first judex of Alpha Chapter)

JUDEX: In the prosecution of any great and important undertaking, the underlying principle which insures success is a broad and firm foundation. So it is with your chosen profession, my brother (s); a privilege, yes, a duty, which you owe to yourself to so lay a foundation upon which to erect a structure which will be an honor not only to yourself but to your profession.

To do this, you must study diligently the history and development of every branch of the law. The law is always in a process of development. By understanding its evolution, you will be able intelligently to proceed in the unexplored fields, and be of valuable assistance in expounding and formulating the laws which are to govern future generations. No branch of the law can be traced with greater benefit or more interest than the common law.

It includes those principles, usages, and rules of action applicable to the government and security of person and property which do not rest for their authority upon any express and positive declaration of the will of the legislature.

A great proportion of the rules and maxims which constitute the immense code of common law grew into use by gradual adoption, and received from time to time the sanction of the courts of justice without any legislative act or interference.

It is not the production of the wisdom of some one man or society of men in any one age; but of the wisdom, counsel, experience, and observation of many ages of wise and observing men.

When the common law is spoken of as the unwritten law, it is meant that it is law not written by authority of law. The decisions of courts which establish or declare a rule of law may be reduced to writing and published in the reports, but the report is not the law; it is but the evidence of the law, a written account of one application of a legal principle, which principle, in the theory of the common law, is unwritten.

It is only by legislative power that law can be framed by phraseology and by forms of expression.

The common law excludes such bondage. Its principles are not limited nor hampered by the mere form in which they may have been expressed; they are still unwritten and ready with all the adaptability of truth to meet every new and unexpected case.

The common law is the evolution of those principles of right and justice embodied in man which he has found advantageous in his intercourse with mankind; therefore it is impossible to state its definite beginning or trace its development apart from the history of the human race.

When the tide of Teutonic immigration swept over northern Europe it carried with it that germ which had developed and characterized it, and which had been transmitted by it to the Angles, Saxons, and Danes long before they left their homes on the shores of the North Sea to invade and take possession of Britain.

The common law of England consists of those maxims of freedom, order, enterprise, and thrift, which had prevailed in the conduct of private affairs, the management of public business, the regulation of domestic institutions, and the acquisition, control, and transfer of property from time immemorial.

The English common law is not in all respects to be taken as the common law of the United States, or of the several States; but our common law is composed of not only the English common law but English statutes as well, as they existed on July 4, 1776, these being modified to suit the conditions of the United States. Some of our States have expressly stipulated in their constitutions that the English common law was to be their law so far as it was applicable to their situation, and the principles upon which courts discriminate between what is to be taken and what is to be left have been much the same whether the common law was adopted by the constitution, statutes, or decisions.

PRÆTOR'S LECTURE ON THE CIVIL LAW

(Composed by Nathan Grant Foster, first prætor of Alpha Chapter)

MY BROTHER(S): In your search for legal knowledge you have been instructed by our honorable judex in the wisdom of the common law, that proud heritage of the Anglo-Saxon race; a system of law of which the history can be traced far back into the dark forests of Germany, where dwelt our warlike Teuton ancestors.

But centuries before we have any authentic record of the common law there was growing up, on the banks of the Tiber, a system of jurisprudence which is a marvel of wisdom and justice, and which challenges the admiration of the world. This system is known to us as the civil or Roman law, and forms the basis of the laws of continental Europe and a large part of both Americas.

For convenience in instruction, the growth of the civil law may be divided into three periods: First, the period of the early law, dating from the founding of the Eternal City until the compilation of the Twelve Tables; second, the period from the compilation of the Twelve Tables to the codification under Emperor Justinian; and, third, from the codification until the destruction of the Roman Empire.

Very little is known of the law of the first period, which consisted of the leges regiæ, or laws and usages of the Romans under their kings; but after the kings had been expelled and the administration of justice had been transferred from the kings to the consuls, it became necessary to check their despotic power, and for this purpose the Valerian law was enacted. This law granted to persons accused of capital offenses a right of appeal to the people, and it became a principle of Roman jurisprudence, and capital punishment could not be inflicted on a Roman citizen without a vote of the Roman people, and this, like the habeas corpus act of the common law, became the palladium of civil liberty. But the evils arising from an uncertain and varying system of jurisprudence at length became insupportable and gave rise to the second or middle period of Roman law. A committee of three was appointed to draft a new set of laws, which were submitted to 10 men called decemviri. The result was the Twelve Tables, which were ratified by a vote of patricians and plebeians alike.

These laws were engraved on tablets of wood, brass, and ivory, and were drawn from the laws of the kings, the laws of other nations, and certain new enactments which wisdom and experience seemed to dictate. Time will not permit us to dwell upon the provisions of the Twelve Tables, but you are earnestly admonished to study them at your earliest convenience, since no student of law can afford to be without some knowledge of so renowned a production.

An important source of increase and improvement in the Roman law is found in the edicts of the prætors.

Every prætor on entering upon his duties established and promulgated certain rules according to which he proposed to administer justice during his term of office, and these prætorian edicts finally became a substitute for the Twelve Tables.

Another source of increase was the responsa prudentium, or opinion of the lawyers. The most ancient of these interpreters of the law were the members of the College of Pontifices, or priests, but finally the most eminent private citizens, like Cicero, took up the study and practice of law as being the grace, ornament, and most honorable business of old age.

Other sources of the law were the leges, or the will of the whole people as declared in the Comitia Centuriata; the plebiscita, enacted in the Comitis Tributa; the Senatus Consulta, promulgated by the senate; the legis actiones of the priests, which correspond to our common-law pleadings, was known only to members of the College of Pontifices, and was styled by Cicero a cunning and captious verbal science.

At a later period came the Constitutio Principis, or ordinances of the emperors. These last were of three kinds: Rescripts, or letters in answer to petitions, or to a distant magistrate; decrees, passed in a public court of justice; and edicts.

At length the bulk of Roman law had increased to such proportions that it filled 2,000 books, and a revision became necessary, which led to the third period of the Roman law, beginning in the reign of Justinian.

This Emperor caused the law which had been accumulating for 14 centuries to be collected into one systematic code. The first code, called "Codex Vetus," was the work of Johannes and 10 others, and is now entirely lost. The second, or revised code, consisted of 12 volumes and contained the mass of the law. This was the work of Tribonian and four other justices.

The Pandects, or digests, consisted of 50 volumes, and was an abridgement of the decisions of the prætors and the opinions of eminent lawyers. This was the work of 16 jurists, with Tribonian at their head.

The fundamental principles and elements of the law, designed for the use of students, were gathered in four volumes and were used in the law schools which flourished at Berytus, Rome, and Constantinople. The last were published the Novels of Justinian, or new imperial statutes, passed after the code was completed.

My brother, I have traced for your benefit the growth of the civil law, and how true it is that the labor of man's mind often survives after the works of his hands have crumbled into dust and are forgotten.

From beyond the Danube, and from the dark forests of the north, swept myriads of fierce warriors, who scaled the Alps, and like an avalanche poured into Italy. Rome, the Eternal City, the proud mistress of the world, was overcome, and for a time law was lost in chaos—but only for a time.

A sudden shock may turn the needle from the pole, but the irresistible law of magnetism soon draws it back again.

The grand destinies of Rome are not yet accomplished, for to-day she rules throughout the world by her reason, having ceased to reign by her authority.

(End of prætor's lecture.)

CHANCELLOR'S LECTURE ON EQUITY

(Composed by Charles Vey Holman, first chancellor of Alpha Chapter)

CHANCELLOR. Equity, however defined, my brother(s), is universally regarded by mankind as the practice of absolute justice in the forum of conscience, under the dictate of abstract right.

Aristotle has summed it up cogently and succinctly as being in its very nature the correction of the law wherein it is defective by reason of its universality.

Grotius follows the great Greek philosopher almost literally in his definition, saying: "Peculiarly and particularly, of a truth, equity is the virtue of good will, correctress of that in which the law falls short because of its universality."

Bound by no hard and fast rules of procedure, indebted to the grace of no legal fictions for the right to work out justice, hampered not by the restrictive limitations of precedent, but in all things guided solely by the desire to see equal and exact justice done as between man and man, equity in its earlier estate in our English jurisprudence was so manifestly founded upon basic principles of right and conscience that it seems almost impossible to credit the jealousy with which the courts and practitioners of the common law sought to bar its onward progress.

It seems incredible that courts and officers of justice should have been so prejudiced by adherence to ancient and in many instances outworn forms, capable of perpetuation only by the constant invention of legal fictions to make it appear that the law changeth not, as to war upon a system of judicature whose only aim was to render unto every man his just and equal due. But such was the case for centuries, the courts of common law regarding with utmost jealousy that dispensation of justice which, indeed, was known only as the extraordinary jurisdiction of the court of chancery.

That all this is now so happily changed is due to the inexhaustible leavening power of those primary principles of abstract justice upon which courts of equity founded at once their jurisdiction and their practice.

When we consider, however, those stately words of Justinian, "Justice is the constant and perpetual desire and purpose of rendering unto every man his own right," and remember that this single sentence epitomizes, possibly as fully as so brief a word-photograph can do, the whole scope and range of equity as we understand it, it is not difficult to comprehend that it has so triumphed over its foster brothers, the common law and the Roman civil law; that it has been able, as it were, to soften the rigid outlines of their abstract, logical rules and to mold their mechanical, universal, unvarying results into gentler forms, without, in an iota, impairing their full usefulness as the media of justice and of right, particularly weaving all that is best and truest in each of these great systems of jurisprudence into one grand fabric of universal, all-reaching, all-embracing, all-satisfying law.

Nothing, my brother, could withstand the progress of a system of jurisprudence founded upon principles like those enunciated by Justinian in these words: "These are the precepts of our law: To live honestly, to injure none other, to render unto each his own."

Following the law, supplementing the law, correcting, amplifying, and softening the law, surely Equity's mission has been a graceful and a noble one, and it is small wonder that we seem to-day to be approaching an era when all law will be transmitted into equity and equitable considerations alone will govern in all law—a period to be reached perchance within our own time, when some disciple of the Fraternity of Gamma Eta Gamma may declare to the world that humanity has at last reached that golden epoch foreshadowed by Cicero, when he declared, so eloquently, "If all can not be equal in property, if the talents of all can not be the same, the laws, at least, should be the same, to those who are citizens in the same republic."

My brother, I can not wish you better fortune than that you may live to be the one who shall proclaim the arrival of that glorious day.

(End of chancellor's lecture.)

Great journalists throughout the length and breadth of the land have been for several years editorially calling the attention of the bench and bar to the absolute need of a wiser thought, a stronger and firmer hand, a more enlightened viewpoint, a better understanding, and a more certain and definite attitude in regard to that alone which will make law enforcement yield beneficial results, and that is a receptivity on the part of the people, a receptivity which may be properly denominated obedience to the law.

The attitude of every adult man and woman with respect to the concerns of life is the result of a growth which in a sense is education. There have always been two theories, I think, about education. One theory is that the mind of the child is like a sheet of white paper on which we might write out such characters as we please by instruction. The other theory is that the child is a bundle of inherited capacities and tendencies and can be educated only along the lines to which he is naturally inclined or slants. Perhaps both theories may be and are combined from the standpoint of the teachers of our schools, colleges, and universities to-day. It is certain, however, that in view of the alarming criminal tendencies on the part of a vast number of our people, as evidenced by the newspaper accounts of homicides, thefts, and other law infractions of a major and minor nature, that the controlling agencies in our educational systems must insist with greater and more effective persuasiveness that our schools in all of the grades and branches be used for the purpose of teaching the law as far as the youth and mind of the pupils can accommodate themselves to its simplicities, complexities, and particularly with respect to a compliance with its mandates.

If respect for the law were taught children even as their A B C's, I am satisfied that the school system would emphasize and accentuate the justification for its existence to-day. For it is clear that illiteracy itself, as great a calamity as it may be to a people could not be any more menacing than the tide of criminality that threatens to engulf the next, if not this present generation. Young men and young women lawyers may find far more fertile fields for their endeavors in the school than in the court room and have the proud satisfaction of knowing that they are preparing the youth of the land for a firmer and nobler attitude toward the law of the country, its institutions, and the splendid destiny we are pleased to assure ourselves is its goal. Even if the schoolhouse be treated as an auxiliary of the home and the church, it is admitted that it furnishes the opportunity where on a broader scale may be taught the principles of virtue, morality, obedience, and patriotism to a degree that might not be attained in any other theater of action. It is clear that in the development of our civilization that the school and the church are both treated as extensions and laterals of the home and more and more the country is depending upon these great institutions to inculcate those virtues which will strengthen the mud sills and foundations of the Republic while adorning its superstructure.

It is a speed age. Airplanes, radio, automobiles as well as their illustrious predecessors, the telegraph and telephone, indicate just as surely as the jazz music the rapidity of the pace at which we are traveling. They are not the cause of our speed so much as an effect of a feverish or hectic desire to race through life instead of sauntering along its many splendid roadways and vistas. Do not misunderstand me, I would not prohibit these instrumentalities that have made for the comfort and convenience of hundreds of millions of people, and the haste and excitement of many more millions. I would wisely regulate their activities and operations, so as to get the greatest possible use out of them with the least possible effect. In the field of mechanics just as in every other phase of human existence, it is well, generally speaking, to regulate rather than to prohbit. Ascertain the ineradicable tendencies of human nature and by a sagacious regulation make an asset out of what would be a liability under prohibition.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am promoting the public welfare in some small way in publishing these lectures and making these respectful observations. I hope that they will prove intellectually entertaining if not instructive to those readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, whose attention may be arrested by them. And if they contribute in some small way even to bring about that respect for and obedience to the law so absolutely necessary for the continuance of free institutions, and the stability of the Republic itself I will feel tremendously gratified and know that I have not spent this little time in vain.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had under consideration the bill H. DEATH OF SENATOR WOODBRIDGE N. FERRIS

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, it is with great sorrow and regret that I announce that my colleague, Senator FERRIS, of Michigan, expired at 6.15 this morning from an attack of bronchial pneumonia. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, March 23, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Rev. Charles Tilton, D. D., of Boston, Mass., offered the following prayer:

Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations, before the mountains were brought forth, before Thou hadst ever formed the earth and the world. Even from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God; in Thee we live and move and have our being, and Thou upholdest all things by the word of Thy power. Master of life and men, be Thou present in this assembly to-day to lead and to guide in all the counsels and deliberations of this hour. May every act be begun, continued, and ended in Thee. Thou art the guide of all the universe: Thou tellest the stars by their name, and yet Thou dost note the sparrow's fall with tender sympathy. Thou rulest the nations, and yet Thou leadest the babe by the hand and hearest the faintest cry of infancy and old age. May Thy gentleness make our Nation great. Bless, we pray Thee, these assembled Representatives of our Nation from every part of the land. Bless their homes, bless the towns and cities and States from which they come. Bless, we pray Thee, the President of the United States; guide and direct his steps, and may his life and health be precious in Thy sight. Bless every citizen of our land. Bless the stranger that is within our gates. Make our Nation, O God, a blessing to all the nations of the earth; and may the blessings of Heaven rest upon us and all fellow citizens. May brotherly love prevail in all our borders, and may every moral and social virtue and truth cement us. In the name of our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM TYLER PAGE

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made over the radio on February 22, 1928, on the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birthday of George Washington by the Hon. William Tyler Page, the secretary of the commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. UNDERHILL. What is it?

Mr. HAWLEY. An address delivered by Hon. William Tyler Page on George Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech:

CELEBRATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. PAGE. Several years ago Congress established a commission to be known as the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, the short name for which is the George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The commission is composed of 19 members. The President of the United States is chairman, and the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are members ex officio. The other members are Senator S. D. FESS, vice chairman; Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas; Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia; Senator THOMAS F. BAYARD, of Delaware; Representatives W. C. HAWLEY, of Oregon; JOHN Q. TILSON, of Connecticut; JOSEPH W. BYRNS, of Tennessee; and JOHN N. GARNER, of Texas. The commissioners by appointment of the President are Mrs. Anthony Wayne Cook, of Pennsylvania, honorary president general of the Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution; Mrs. Mary Sherman, of Colorado, president of the Federation of Women's Clubs; Henry Ford, of Michigan; Col. Hanford MacNider, of Iowa; C. Bascom Slemp, of Virginia; Edgar B. Piper, of Oregon; Bernard M. Baruch, of New York; and Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, of Massachusetts, who is also historian of the commission.

The executive committee is composed of the congressional members and three of the presidential commissioners. Also there are committees on relations with state commissions, on the participation of women, on a commemoration plan, on relations with historical and other learned societies, on relations with business organizations and fraternities, on publication, on educational methods and library work, and on observances and pageants. The commission is authorized by act of Congress to prepare a plan and a program for signalizing the commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington and to give due and proper consideration to any plan or plans which may be submitted to them, and through such steps as may be necessary in the coordination and correlation of plans prepared by State commissions, or by bodies created under appointment by the governors of the States and by representative civil bodies, and if the participation of other nations be deemed advisable to communicate with the governments of such nations.

Last year on the anniversary of Washington's birthday President Coolidge, as chairman of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, delivered an address to the American people in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, in which he invited their cooperation. This was followed by a concurrent resolution of Congress inviting the legislatures and the governors of the States and Territories to cooperate with the United States commission in such manner as may seem to them most fitting, to the end that the bicentennial anniversary of the birth of him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen"—the pioneer, the soldier, the statesman, the husbandman, the exemplar of American citizenship, George Washington—may be commemorated in the year 1932 in such manner that future generations of American citizens may live according to the example and precepts of his exalted life and character and thus perpetuate the American people.

In response to this invitation of Congress the States have displayed great interest, and already about one-third of the States have authorized the creation of State commissions, and other States will follow in line when their legislatures again meet. The preliminary work of the commission has been one of organization. A large number of plans and suggestions have been submitted to the commission, some for memorials, others for pageants, and still others for domestic and international expositions.

While all of these propositions will be given consideration, the commission has kept clearly in mind the concept of the character of such a celebration expressed by the late Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University. Doctor Eliot was greatly interested in the proposed commemoration, and not long before he died he suggested that the celebration should be spiritual, not materialistic. It should be directed, he said, in large measure to the rising generation, not to the passing or the past. It should appeal to the thinking people, not to the careless or indifferent. Its aim should be to increase the number of Washington disciples and followers in and for the struggles of the future.

With this concept in mind it has seemed that an exposition in the old sense, a great display of material achievements and resources ought not to be planned; also, that this celebration should not be international, but distinctly and thoroughly all American—a get together of America with a common heritage and with a common people. However, individuals and groups of nationals of other countries believing in and devoted to the principles of Washington and grateful for his example and mighty deeds for the promotion of liberty and justice among mankind will have ample opportunity to give expression to their convictions without the aid of an international celebration, with its attendant expense and glamor.

It is also thought that the celebration ought to meet the vital needs of America and that these needs are not material but spiritual in a broad sense. Not more inventions, but more consciousness of that for which America stands. Not more materialism, but more conscience and adherence to the fundamental ideals of which George Washington was the foremost exemplar. It is seriously suggested, therefore, that the program of the year 1932 center about the coming together for serious consideration of vital things of the brains and leadership of the entire Nation, of all the States, and of all parties, creeds, and classes—a great family reunion of America at the homestead of its illustrious fathers.

A comprehensive plan has been adopted by the commission, embracing the publication of the writings of George Washington and the publication of monographs, to be known as the George Washington bicentennary series, dealing with every phase of his life and character.

These works are in course of preparation under the direction of the historian. When available to the people of the United States they will possess authentic, accurate, and authoritative information concerning the man whose birth is to be commemorated. With this material the purpose is to make an intensive nation-wide campaign of education on the life, ideals, and deeds of Washington, and of the great underlying principles of the American Republic. This campaign could be made a part of the program of the schools, colleges, churches, civic bodies, women's groups, labor groups, etc., and of the press of the Nation. This would mean the education of the leadership of the Nation in the needs, purposes, and plans of the movement and the enlistment of every State, city, and group.

In this connection also it is proposed to have a system for competitions based on the study of George Washington material to be arranged through State commissions and auxiliaries. This would include prize essays with local and national competitions and possibly the awarding of national prizes for the five works on Washington adjudged to be the best, the awards to be made during the year 1932.

The most outstanding suggestions of permanent physical memorials are the proposed highway between the city of Washington and Mount Vernon, the completion of the Washington Memorial by the erection of a substructure or terrace, the completion of the George Washington Memorial Building, the foundation of which was laid in 1921, and the restoration of Wakefield, the birthplace of George Washington, in Westmoreland County, Va.

Congress may itself provide for one or more of these proposed memorials, but the commission has not as yet adopted any memorial project. The Washington Memorial Building, it is understood, will be financed by private subscription. This is also true to some extent of the plan to make Wakefield a national shrine, the National Wakefield Association having obtained consent of Congress to build a replica of the house in which George Washington was born.

The commission has under consideration a general plan, nation-wide in its scope, as the basis upon which each and every organization and individual can adjust themselves. This plan has in mind that the proposed celebration is to be one in which every American citizen and every organization should participate and have some part, leaving details to be arranged and perfected by State commissions.

It is thought that with the cooperation of the States and with every kind of organization in this country the two hundredth anniversary of his birth in 1932 can be made a wonderful and dignified commemoration in keeping with the simplicity and greatness of the life and character of George Washington.

JURIES IN FELONY CASES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in regard to a bill I have introduced to-day to regulate the separation of juries in felony and capital cases, and a brief statement in regard to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes; my own remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following bill:

[H. R. 12350, Seventieth Congress, first session]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 20, 1928.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill to regulate the separation of juries in felony cases in the District of Columbia

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended, is amended by adding after section 919 thereof two new sections, as follows:

"SEC. 919a. The jury empaneled and sworn to try any capital offense shall not be permitted to separate until discharged according to law from further consideration of the case, except that in any such case where the presiding judge is of the opinion that absolute necessity requires separation he may permit such jury to separate temporarily to such extent as he may deem necessary.

"SEC. 919b. The jury empaneled and sworn to try a felony not capital shall not be permitted to separate until discharged according to law from further consideration of the case, except that the presiding judge may permit such jury to separate to such extent as may be agreed to by the prosecuting attorney and the attorney or attorneys of record for the defendant."

STATEMENT

Mr. Speaker, the practice has prevailed in the courts of the District of Columbia—probably always in the trial of felony cases less than capital and for several years in capital cases—to allow juries to separate during the trial of such cases.

The object of this bill is to put an end to such practice and to keep the jury together when trying a capital case, except a jury trying such a case, under the terms of the bill, may be permitted to separate temporarily in cases of absolute necessity; and likewise to keep the jury together when trying a felony case less than capital, though the bill provides the jury may be permitted to separate during the trial of such case if the attorney for the defendant and the Government consent.

The common law which is in force in this District requires the presiding judge in the trial of a capital case to keep the jury together. I am reliably informed this law has been ignored by the judges trying capital cases for several years.

Under the common law the presiding judge, when trying a felony case less than capital, may in his discretion permit separation of a jury, notwithstanding the attorney for the Government and the defendant may object to such separation.

In the case of the Government against Louis Phillips, charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States Government, the jury was allowed to separate, though the trial covered a period of several weeks. A verdict of not guilty was rendered.

In the case of the Government against Fall and Sinclair, charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States Government, the jury was allowed to separate. On account of charges that the jury was being tampered with a mistrial was declared.

ARTICLE BY HON. FRANKLIN F. KORELL

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating in the RECORD an article written by our colleague, Mr. KORELL, of Portland, Oreg., in the last issue of the National Republic.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Speaker, the unsurpassable beauty and the great potentiality of the Pacific coast have been the inspiration of many articles. We of California are always glad to have the attractions and the opportunities of the Pacific coast brought to the attention of the American people. We believe that it is important that all who read shall know what a wonderful country we have out there. Of course, we of California believe that nature has been more generous with the gifts she has bestowed upon California than any other section of the globe. We do not believe that the attractions of any other place can so much as equal them. However, when we are forced to it we sometimes acknowledge that our neighboring States of Oregon and Washington have much beauty and grandeur, and that they, like California, have been blessed with a wonderful climate, and we know that these States are inhabited by an intelligent, industrious, enterprising, and patriotic people.

As a sort of invitation to the world to make a trip to the Pacific coast, and particularly to the State of California, I shall refer in connection with my remarks to the leading article appearing in the April issue of the National Republic. The article was written by our colleague and my friend, Hon. FRANKLIN F. KORELL, Representative in Congress from Oregon. The article is entitled "Land of history and promise." It calls attention to the fact that Oregon is a Commonwealth of scenic beauty and of almost limitless resources carved out of the great Northwest. Oregon is a great State, and Portland, its leading city, is a great metropolis; and I would not appear to minimize this importance. Of course, Oregon is sort of a backyard for the great Commonwealth of California, and everything which this article states, or which anybody can say, in praise of Oregon can be said with equal force for the whole Pacific coast, especially for the great State of California.

Mr. KORELL's article can be read with interest and profit by the people of this country. I know that it will be appreciated by the people of California, and particularly by the people of my own home, the city of Los Angeles, whose population has increased with such unprecedented rapidity and whose borders are being extended so rapidly in all directions that in area, at least, it is now the greatest city in the world. Los Angeles is looking forward with pleasant anticipation to the day which will no doubt be in the near future when it shall annex the beautiful and thriving city of Portland, Oreg., as another one of its suburbs.

The article is as follows:

LAND OF HISTORY AND PROMISE—OREGON IS A COMMONWEALTH OF SCENIC BEAUTY AND ALMOST LIMITLESS RESOURCES CARVED OUT OF THE GREAT NORTHWEST

It is easy, even for a layman, if he is acquainted with the subject, to write of the great State of Oregon, with its lofty and majestic mountains, its wide and sweeping plains, its fertile valleys, plunging waterfalls, and the beautiful river which forms its northern boundary. For Oregon is a State of great natural beauty, of tremendous—one might say almost endless—resources, with a history which forms one of the most interesting chapters of the great romance of our western empire. Oregon's greatest mountains are the beautiful Cascades, gleaming with perpetual snow, with Mount Hood, at an elevation of 11,225 feet, towering above; the Three Sisters, Mount McLoughlin, Mount Jefferson, and other historic peaks which are only a little less imposing. Its most beautiful river is the Columbia, which looms so large in the history of the Northwest. And in addition to its imposing mountains and fertile valleys, there are great plains to the east.

The average elevation of Oregon is 3,300 feet, which is just about right for comfortable and energetic human existence. The State's climate is variable, with a humid, mild, and even temperature along the coast and a dry and variable condition east of the mountains. And Oregon has as many kinds of soil as it has climate; clay loams, enriched in the river bottoms by deposits from the streams; reddish clay in the southwest; and in the east a gray soil, lacking in humus but easily worked and containing an abundance of the elements which make the growth of vegetation easy and practicable.

In area Oregon is the ninth State of the Union; in extent, 95,607 square miles. It is eighty times as large as Rhode Island. Two Ohios could be put into it with enough left for Maryland. Oregon is twice as large as the State of New York and a third larger than all of New England.

In the valleys west of the Cascades and along the Columbia River are to be found some of the richest agricultural regions in the world. Oregon is famous for its fruits, and there is much wheat and grazing land on the sweeping plains. Its forests are notable and form one of its great natural resources. Its fisheries, with the Columbia standing at the top, are world famous. Its manufacturing and commerce are growing rapidly due to the working of its tremendous resources—but I shall have more to say of this a little later on.

The history of Oregon is the history of the development of the great Northwest—a region teeming with nascent ideas and potential accomplishment. It is full of romance and adventure, of fighting, of the enduring of hardships, and of the struggles of the early pioneers to reclaim the land from the wilderness and make it a part of the United States.

Legend tells us that the early Spaniards were the first white men to visit the Oregon region and they may have arrived there shortly after Balboa's discovery of the Pacific Ocean. Francis Drake was there in 1579 and took possession of that part of the coast in the name of Queen Elizabeth, calling it "New Albion." In 1774 Juan Perez sailed up the west coast to 54° north latitude and made perhaps the first real exploration of the Oregon coast. In 1778 Jonathon Carver published in London a book of travels in which he claimed that there was a great river in the Northwest called the Oregon, but added that no white man had seen it and the information came from Indians. For years intrepid explorers sailed the waters of the Pacific searching for the fabled river.

Finally in 1792 Capt. Robert Gray, an American, discovered the long-sought river of tradition and named it after his ship Columbia. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the Oregon region was claimed by Spain, by Great Britain, and by the United States. In 1805 Lewis and Clark, under the direction of President Jefferson, crossed the mountains and went down the river to the Oregon coast.

American and British fur traders, attracted by the immense profits to be made, invaded the new region and established trading posts there as early as 1808. After the War of 1812 a dispute naturally arose between Great Britain and the United States over the ownership of the Oregon country. In 1819 Spain, still the owner of California, waived to the United States its claim of all territory north of 42° latitude. For the next 20 years the history of Oregon is the story of the rivalry between British fur traders and American immigrants. Fortunately for the Americans, the British did not desire to settle the country but to use it only as a game preserve. In the end the American policy of settling it proved the most profitable and enduring.

Things changed rapidly after 1832, when four Indian chiefs journeyed from the Oregon country to St. Louis to get a copy of the white man's Bible. Immediately a wave of missionary zeal was aroused, and hardy enthusiasts of the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Roman Catholic, and other Christian faiths went into Oregon to convert the heathen redskins. The first white women to arrive were the wives of Marcus Whitman and Henry Spalding, who journeyed there with their husbands in 1836.

The early law of the region was British—the rules and regulations of the Hudson Bay Co.—but in 1843 the settlers at Champoeg, in the Willamette Valley, by a vote of 52 to 50, organized a provisional government, first with an executive committee of three citizens, and then, two years later, with a governor. In the first set of laws were included many of the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, including the article against slavery.

In 1843 came the great immigration which has been immortalized in song and story. It started when 900 men, women, and children set out from Independence, Mo., in covered wagons and made the journey to the new country safely after enduring many hardships and perils. From that time on immigration steadily increased, and then came the demand for the location of the boundaries of the Western Territories. In 1844 the Democratic National Convention declared that the United States had full title to all of Oregon, and "54–40 or fight" became the campaign slogan of the year. The Democrats won, and President Polk in his inaugural message claimed title for the Nation to all the Oregon Territory. For a time it seemed that war might result from the disagreement, but finally a treaty was drawn up by James Buchanan, Secretary of State, and Richard Packenham, the British envoy, and this was ratified by the American Senate and by Great Britain. The treaty was in the nature of a compromise and fixed the American boundary at 49° north latitude.

The organization of the Territory was held up temporarily by the proslavery forces in Congress, but in 1847 Indian outbreaks in Oregon spurred Congress to action, and on August 14, 1848, a bill was passed providing for a Territorial government, the new Territory including the present States of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington and parts of Montana and Wyoming. The Territory of Washington was created in 1853. The people of Oregon Territory voted for statehood in 1856. Next year the people ratified a State constitution which they had drawn up, and on February 14, 1859, Oregon was admitted as a State, with its present boundaries.

In 1862 gold was discovered in eastern Oregon and southern Idaho. A great rush followed. Then came the pony express, to be succeeded by the railroads in the early eighties.

Since then Oregon has developed and prospered as only American Commonwealths seem able to prosper and develop under constitutional representative government. Its great natural resources are being rapidly brought into use. To-day they are paying rich tribute to the brain and brawn of mankind, adding bounteously to the needs and comfort of human life.

But an article on Oregon would not be complete without something concerning its chief city, its principal port and industrial center. I refer, of course, to Portland, one of America's choice cities. Portland, internationally known as the City of Roses, is a thriving community of more than 350,000 people, and if its present growth continues it will soon have a population of 600,000 and a metropolitan area embracing a million people.

In 1916 the postal receipts of Portland were $1,201,262. In 1926 they aggregated $3,900,887, an increase of over 150 per cent in 10 years. The figures for 1927 have not been made available as yet by the Post Office Department.

Over 105,997 building permits were issued by the city between 1920 and 1927. Their aggregate value showed an increase of over 231.2 per cent in building during this period and an increase in the value of residence building of over 356.5 per cent. During the seven years immediately preceding 1927 the public-school enrollment increased 24.8 per cent, and the school-age census showed an increase of 27.3 per cent.

Any record of the city's growth within the last few years would not be complete without some mention of its industrial development.

Portland is situated at the confluence of the Willamette and the Columbia Rivers. It is in the very heart of the world's richest agricultural sections. It possesses a geographical position that is steadily attracting manufacturers who are obliged to give consideration to the question of transportation costs in connection with the operation of their business. It is a natural gateway of outlet for the export wealth of that vast tributary area, so named the Inland Empire, likewise sometimes called the Columbia River Basin.

The territory served by the port of Portland contains roughly 250,000 square miles and has a population that is conservatively estimated as 4,281,816 people. The products from this great hinterland come down to the city over the only water-grade route through the mountains of the Pacific coast. Portland is the great central market and seaport of the Pacific Northwest. Freight moves to it from all points of the Columbia River Basin. As this empire of natural resources is developed, so will all the products of mines and forests and farms grow into a steadily increasing volume of traffic for exports through the city as its gateway. In recognition of the obviously lower costs of operation of rail lines hauling freight by water grade, correspondingly favorable rail rates have been obtained for Portland and their justification maintained by various decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Portland is the greatest originating seaport in the world. In 1926 its record of water-borne commerce showed that 3,148,211 tons of domestic freight were handled, an increase of 134.4 per cent over the figures for 1920.

One million eight hundred sixteen thousand five hundred and thirty-seven tons of foreign freight were handled over the same period, an increase of 256.9 per cent. Fifty-three steamship lines are now giving regular service from the port. A few years ago there were less than a half dozen. Rail transportation has shown a corresponding increase and expansion.

I mean by greatest originating port that Portland produces more of the products that it transports than any other port. To be specific, one-third of the total standing timber of the United States is in the State of Oregon to-day, of which Portland is the outstanding center. Sixteen per cent of all the grain in the United States is produced in the Northwest, of which over 58 per cent is shipped out by boat via the port of Portland. Pulpwood, wool, mohair, flax, fruits, and vegetables are other products produced in large quantities for many basic industries. The agricultural production of the Columbia country, of which Portland is a great central market and seaport, amounted to $544,821,000 in 1926.

Between 1919 and 1926 bank clearings increased from $1,652,-950,830.27 to $2,103,846,193.06, a record of growth that has not been surpassed or equaled by any other city in the Northwest. Pay rolls were increased in 1927 by upward of $1,659,700.

Portland is the first city of the United States in manufacture and export of lumber, first in export of wheat, second in export of apples, and fourth in flour. It is the first primary wool-export port and the second largest wool market. It leads the Pacific coast as livestock market, in the manufacture of woolen textiles, flour, automatic stokers, automatic motive hoists, locomotives, pulp, and paper. It is the first in the Pacific Northwest in total foreign-commerce tonnage and its leading jobbing center.

Let me say further that Portland is a city of substantial buildings, of good schools, and comfortable homes situated near some of the most beautiful scenic spots in America. Its broad green lawn and rose-bordered gardens are world renowned. And better even than all this, it is a typically American city, a city of progressive people, a city of home atmosphere, refinement, patriotism, and culture.

I have tried to tell you something briefly of the reasons I am proud of my great home State and my beautiful home city. But in order really to appreciate these you ought to come and visit us out on the Pacific coast. You will be impressed by our mountains and valleys, by our beautiful drives along the Willamette and Columbia Rivers, and by our thriving cities and towns. And, best of all, our people will greet you with cordial good will, a hearty welcome, and a spirit in keeping with the bigness and richness of our wonderful country. You will love to linger and long to return to Oregon.

I am not trying to maintain that Oregon has all the beauties and blessings of the Nation. Each section has its scenic spots, its sound American people, its fine traditions, and its material advantages. But we believe that we have our portion of these and we will be glad to share them with you whenever you may honor us with a visit.

ADDRESS OF HON. FRANK B. MURPHY, OF OHIO

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday my friend and colleague, Mr. MURPHY, of Ohio, a Methodist and a thirty-third degree Mason, delivered an address at the banquet of the Ancient Order of Hibernians at the Willard Hotel in this city. I ask the privilege of printing that speech in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech:

THE IRISH IN AMERICA

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Toastmaster, ladies, and gentlemen, what a priceless heritage is ours as we assemble here to commemorate and keep bright the memory of one whose influence upon our blood is ever increasing with the onrush of the years. What a heritage is ours when we think of St. Patrick, a leader of men, a teacher and a benefactor of mankind. What a heritage is ours when we realize that in our blood runs the resiliency of character that does not know defeat; a resiliency of character that may be down, but, to use the vernacular of the day, is never out. Yes, my Irish fellow citizens, it is a real honor to me to have the privilege to join with you all in this happy occasion, and as my mind drifts back over the history of our fair land, the land we love so well—America—I see a ship landing on the rockbound coast of New England, after being buffeted by the stormy Atlantic for many days; and on that ship there are two Irish families—one headed by William Mullens, the other by Christopher Martin. Then my mind drifts to the romantic side of Irish character, and I see the name of a daughter of William Mullens written in the perfume of romance, as Priscilla, on the memorable occasion when John Alden spoke to her of the love of a friend of his, retorted, "Speak for yourself, John Alden." Ah, who but a bright-eyed Irish colleen would have taken the initiative as she did in those early days? Yes; two Irish families came over on the Mayflower and they have written the story of romance. Then others followed in their course, and still others came, until sprinkled throughout all of the Colonies a healthy group of Irish people could be found laughing, working, thriving, becoming good citizens wherever they might be found. And then there came a time when the liberty-loving people, who had left lands overseas to find a land where they might worship God according to their own conscience, decided that America should really be a land of the free, and 12 of the 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence were Irishmen. We find all through American life the imprint of Irish character. I have not the time to enumerate here the outstanding Irish who have made patriotic history in the struggles of this fair land of ours, because wherever there was a war being fought for freedom or for liberty there could be found the Irishman fighting side by side with the other struggling men of earth, seeking liberty always.

History does not record where Irish soldiers ever fought to place any other people in subjection, and throughout the struggle for our own independence many high places of responsibility and confidence were held by Irishmen; and as we think of St. Patrick's Day we find that it has been held in high esteem by the Irish people in all the countries of the world. And on March 17, St. Patrick's Day, 1737, I find that 20 Irish Protestant gentlemen met in the city of Boston, Mass., to honor the memory of St. Patrick and pay tribute to his noble character and formed the Charitable Irish Society. This was the first public observance of St. Patrick's Day which is recorded.

I also find a very interesting matter of history, in that two Masonic lodges were named for this God-loving Christian Irish saint, namely, St. Patrick Lodge of Freemasons at Johnstown, N. Y., and a lodge located at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1780. I find on March 17, 1771, the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, located at Philadelphia, Pa., was organized with 30 members. Of those who formed this society there were Catholics, Presbyterians, Quakers, and Episcopalians. Those were trying days for all the people who had assembled here at that time, but they all had deep in their hearts a sincere desire to build a country where each and all might live, a country that all could love, a country that offered equal opportunity at the starting point to the rich and to the poor alike, to build a country where the rewards would be measured only by the ability to achieve. Yes; we Irish people are unusually blessed by reason of that which stimulates our blood, for no other human beings have survived so much unhappiness and so much long-continued disaster without degeneration.

I find that in March, 1790, the first Hibernian society was formed for the relief of the emigrants in the city of Philadelphia, and at the meetings of this society it was the custom to offer toasts, many of which are patriotic and romantic. One toast I noticed was a toast to Ireland:

"May the virtues of her children be ever an honor to her name."

Another toast was offered to the good women:

"The solace of man in adversity—his pride and comfort in days of prosperity."

At another time the following toast was offered:

"The shamrock and the shillelah, both emblems of Erin—with one we crown our mirth, with the other we drub our enemies."

Another toast runs—

"The Irish nature is like the Irish climate—it smiles, making up for its tears. In such a nature there is no despair."

Yes; in all the ages the Irish have had unconquerable souls and have had the ability that no matter how they might be thrown to the earth they invariably would turn their faces to the sun, and as they saw its gleams and felt the warmth of its rays new hope would enter their hearts and they would smile as they would think of the day that they knew would come. And so you and I have lived long enough to see the dawn of a better day for our people; 'tis not all that we would have it to be, but I had the thrill of my life as I joined with others in extending a welcome to a group of Irish gentlemen who were the guests of our Nation and were unusually honored by our Government by permitting them to enjoy the privilege of the floors of Congress and there meet in person your Representatives.

I find that for more than 200 years the young men of Ireland fled its shores and dispersed themselves all over the world. This period in the history of Ireland was known as the "flight of the wild geese," and I suspect that my father might have been included in that group, because he came to America many years ago along with thousands of others, and in the early year of 1729 I find that there were 9 Irish emigrants to 1 of all other nations of Europe combined.

And what a wonderful account the offspring of those early Irish emigrants has given of their blood. We find them leaders in every human activity. We find them doing the things that could not be done.

We find at least six American Presidents had more or less of a Celtic strain in their veins. President Jackson, whose parents came from the County Down; President Arthur, whose parents were from Antrim; President Buchanan, whose ancestors were from Donegal; and President McKinley, whose ancestors also came from Donegal. Theodore Roosevelt boasted among his ancestors two direct lines from Ireland; and the ancestors of President Polk came from Donegal. Woodrow Wilson was also of Irish descent.

In the realm of invention we find Fulton, an Irishman's son, giving to America priority in the conquest of the seas. We find that the presiding genius of the greatest telephone system in the world is Theodore Vail. We find Morse, the inventor of the telegraph, was the grandson of an Irishman. Henry O'Reily built the first telegraph line in the United States. John W. Mackey is the president of the Commercial Cable Co. We find the submarine was invented by John P. Holland, another Irishman. McCormick, the man who has made the work on the farm light and comfortable, invented the mowing and reaping machine.

In industry we find the great James A. Farrell at the head of the United States Steel Corporation. We also find James J. Hill, the great pioneer builder of railroads. We find the name of James F. Ryan, another great industrial and financial leader. I might go on indefinitely naming these leading Irishmen.

In the judiciary there have been many shining lights of Irish origin. The Supreme Court of the United States was graced by the person of Edward D. White as its Chief Justice, and he was the grandson of one of the rebels of ninety-eight. Justice McKenna also adorned this great seat of learning and justice. There are many other names that might be added to those I have mentioned. There have been many governors of the various States of Irish origin, and it remained for an Irishman to do the unusual thing in politics by representing in the United States Senate three different States of this Union, and Senator Shields was a native of the County Tyrone.

We find among the great editors of our country the name of Henry W. Grady, of the Atlanta Constitution; and Horace Greeley, of the New York Tribune; and the Olivers, of the Pittsburgh Gazette; and O'Neill, of the Pittsburgh Dispatch; Thomas Gill, of the New York Evening Star; and many others whose brains and patriotism have helped shape the national life of this fair land of ours.

In the field of poetry we find Theodore O'Hara, the author of that immortal poem The Bivouac of the Dead; Thomas Dunn English, author of Ben Bolt; Father Abram Ryan, "the poet priest of the South"; and James Whitcomb Riley, whose voice has been silenced by death, but whose songs will be sung as long as intelligence lasts.

Irishmen have shown their very great ability in the handling of great projects. They have been great builders, and among the names that come to me at this time are those of John D. Crimmins, of New York; John B. McDonald, builder of the New York subway; and John Roach, the famous shipbuilder of Chester, Pa.

And when it comes to music, what Irish person will ever forget the name of Victor Herbert? And those who have listened to the marvelous rythm of the band of Patrick Gilmore will ever have a sweet memory. And never as long as Irishmen live will the golden notes that comes from the marvelous throat of John McCormack be forgotten.

And right here in Washington each time you look toward the Capitol and see the colossal statue of America, which graces its Dome, you think of Thomas Crawford, who executed the same, and who was born in New York of Irish parents.

And when we look at the beautiful sculpture of Augustus St. Gaudens our memory goes back to Dublin, the place of his birth. There are many others that might be mentioned.

Ireland has given to America many eminent churchmen—four American cardinals, Hayes, Gibbons, Farley, and O'Connell; many archbishops, bishops, and other high dignitaries. History has given to an Irishman, Francis Makemie, of Donegal, the credit of founding Presbyterianism in America. Among noted Presbyterians of Irish birth was James Waddell, known as the Blind Preacher of the Wilderness; Samuel Finley, president of Princeton College in 1761, was a native of Armagh; and John Blair Smith, famous as a preacher throughout the Shenandoah Valley, and the first president of Union College, 1795, was of Irish descent. There are many others.

We also find many of the cities of the United States have been founded by men of Irish origin. Sixty-five places in the United States are named for people bearing the Irish prefix "O," and upward of 1,000 after the "Mc's." There are 253 counties in the United States and approximately 7,000 places called by Irish family names. There are—

Dublins	24
Waterfords	21
Belfasts	18
Tyrones	16
Limericks	10
Antrims	9
Sligos	8
Derrys	7
Corks	6
Kildares	5

Many of the prominent families in our country have been founded by emigrant Irishmen. I shall not undertake to name them, because it would take too much time. However, I shall encroach upon your time to mention one of the notable Irishmen of to-day. I would not be fair to our race if I did not bring to your attention the name of MARTIN B. MADDEN, an Irishman, who wields more power by reason of his position in our Government than any other one man. We are all proud of his work, because his life is typical of our race. I wish I had more time to tell you of this truly wonderful man and his career. It is one of the outstanding romances of our land of opportunity.

I have refrained from touching on the long list of Irish fighting men, many of whom fought shoulder to shoulder with the father of our country in the days of the Revolution, and from that time down to the World War they have given wonderful accounts of their ability.

While our soldiers were in France a colonel came out one morning after his regiment had been on a long, tiresome parade and said that he would like to have 75 volunteers to do an unusual and dangerous piece of work—or 25 Irishmen would do.

May I call your attention, just for a moment, to the wonderful influence of the Irish people on the home life of this Nation? Present-day discussions of social questions have no place or standing in the thought or plans of the Irish people. As I stand here my mind goes back to the days of the development of this country, when these eminent Irish built the great railway systems of our country and participated in every way in the development and upbuilding of the same and the prosperity which has made America great. In every community where these unsung Irish have congregated they have left their impress by their lives of industry, frugality, and piety, raising large families on a meager income, but with feelings of buoyancy and hope, and firm faith in God. How well they planned can never be measured, because the ambition of the Irish race is so insatiable and so hopeful always that a country where they live must be an active, living, growing place; and so the national life of America has felt the influence of this great race of people, who, for more than 750 years, fought a losing fight for the freedom of their own beautiful little gem of the sea, the Emerald Isle, and home of our ancestors.

And so to-night I congratulate you, as I congratulate myself, on being permitted to be here in a country where we work together, all for each and each for all, to the end that happiness, prosperity, and peace may always gladden the hearts and homes of those who call America their own.

Good night.

RELIEF OF ARAPAHOE AND CHEYENNE INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3343 and pass it. It is identical with one reported from the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 3343, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state whether or not this action has been agreed to by the ranking minority member of his committee.

Mr. LEAVITT. The bill was reported from the committee by the unanimous vote of all members present, and Judge EVANS, who was the ranking minority member present, although not the ranking minority member of the committee, has agreed to this action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the bill been before the House?

Mr. LEAVITT. It has been unanimously reported by the House committee and has been on the Union Calendar for several days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 667 of volume 44 of the Statutes at Large (44 Stat. L. 764) be, and it hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"That the time within which suit or suits may be filed under the terms of the act of Congress of June 3, 1920 (41 Stat. L. 738), is hereby extended for the term of one year from the date of the approval of this act for the purpose only of permitting the Arapahoe and Cheyenne Tribes of Indians residing in the States of Wyoming, Montana, and Oklahoma to file a separate petition or suit in the Court of Claims for the determination of any claim or claims of said tribes of Indians to the whole or any part of the subject matter of any pending suit, or to file other suits hereafter under the terms of said act; and the court is hereby authorized to render final judgment in such suits: Provided, That unless such petition be filed in the suit or suits authorized by said act within the time herein stated all right of intervention by the Arapahoe and Cheyenne Tribes of Indians therein shall be forever barred."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When was this right granted to these Indians in the first instance?

Mr. LEAVITT. It has been about three years that their attorneys have had the right to file this case under the present law.

Mr. BEGG. Why is it necessary to keep extending this right at every session of Congress?

Mr. LEAVITT. For the protection of the Indians in cases where the work has not been done as it should have been done.

Mr. BEGG. I am not, of course, going to object to the passage of the bill, but it seems to me the case should have been filed within the year and that at each session of Congress we ought not to be asked to extend the time. I remember that once or twice before we have extended this right.

Mr. LEAVITT. Only once or twice and never before in the case of these Indians.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

PERMANENT INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ROAD CONGRESSES

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 31, to provide that the United States extend to the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses an invitation to hold the sixth session of the association in the United States, and for the expenses thereof, favorably reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I objected to this resolution yesterday, but I have looked over it this morning and I want to withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses an invitation to hold the sixth session of the association in the United States, either in 1929 or 1930, as the association may determine.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of such session, including printing of reports, compensation of employees, transportation, subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence—notwithstanding the provisions of any other act—and such expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of such invitation in the observance of appropriate courtesies.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "notwithstanding the provisions of any other act."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: On page 2, in line 3, strike out the words "notwithstanding the provisions of any other act."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the reason for offering that amendment is that we now have a general law which regulates per diem and subsistence, and the provisions of the general law are liberal enough, and I do not think we ought to bring in a resolution which would set aside the general law. I do not see any reason why this resolution should be an exception to the general law that governs all of these expenditures. If we engraft one exception to the general law, we are liable to be asked to make many more, resulting in extravagant expenditures of public money.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not agree to this amendment. I would not object to it if it were not for the fact that the resolution will then have to go back to the Senate and go into conference, which would delay it. The United States has intimated that it proposes to invite this congress to Washington; they are holding it off, but they can not hold it any longer than the 1st of April.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. All that will have to be done will be for the Senate to accept the amendment and then it will become a law.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I will leave it to the House, but I do not think we ought to send it back. This amendment should be defeated.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. What is the purpose of the provision as it now stands in the resolution?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The purpose of the provision is this: This expenditure is entirely in the hands of the President, and the sum of $25,000 is appropriated for the expense of printing the reports of this congress and whatever other expenses there may be, such as entertainment, subsistence of delegates, and so on. There is no intention to expend anything lavishly, and certainly the sum of $25,000 is not an excessive amount for the expenses of the congress. There will be very little entertainment, as a matter of fact; most of the entertaining will be done by the different organizations interested in road building.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The amendment which I have offered would not govern the expenditures for entertainment, but if anyone discharging the duties provided for by the resolution should put in a claim for subsistence or per diem they will be governed by the general law, whereas if the provision that is now carried in the bill were permitted to stay in the general law would not govern.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think the gentleman need have any fear about this.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I am very much in sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. I remember that just a year ago we raised the per diem allowance for every Government employee away from his post of duty. Now, why should we open the gate in this instance and increase the allowance and thus set a precedent?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and this was unanimously reported by that committee. I do not see why the gentleman should object to it now on the floor of the House.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to say to the gentleman that as a member of the Committee on Roads the matter has been discussed there and the Bureau of Public Roads is strongly in favor of this resolution. They state that there is another measure pending, to which the gentleman alluded the other day, under which they propose to build four transcontinental roads from this country to Mexico.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Two of them going through the district of the gentleman from Texas and two of them west of his district. That is a measure of great importance, and this conference, the Bureau of Public Roads states, follows up their program, and I think this is a very important measure.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It will be of profit to all of the countries attending the congress, and the gentleman from Ohio need have no fear of any extravagance, because the matter is entirely within the control of the President. I hope the House will not agree to the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HUDSPETH. As I understand, this resolution follows up the other proposition and is very important.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman is correct. The other is for attendance at the Pan American Congress, to be held at Rio Janeiro, Brazil, next year—1929.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make one observation. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] said this was unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I happen to be fortunate enough to be a member. This is quite true, but unfortunately for me I was not present when this measure was reported out, hence I can not be tied by the responsibility of the gentleman from Maryland. So far as trusting the President is concerned, yes, I would trust him to the end of the earth, but the President will have nothing whatever to say about whether they are going to spend $7 a day or $17 a day, and if $25,000 is not enough I know what will happen. They will come in and ask for more. Personally, I see no reason for breaking the law for a group of fellows who are going to have a "joy time" at this convention, any more than to break it for the Government employee who is honestly putting in his time every day in the year and then is called upon to leave the city because of his duties.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to ask the gentleman how he can consider this a "joy time," when there are delegates coming here to discuss the very important question of good roads in connection with Mexico, Nicaragua, and the other countries to the south of us. How can that be termed a junket?

Mr. BEGG. If the gentleman from Texas will read the report of this congress when it is over, he will find a major portion of the expenditure has been put in for social activities.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; I know that speech has been made by my friend from Ohio here for years.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. You can not have a lot of social activity at $7 a day.

Mr. BEGG. We do not want them.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That is the same old speech the gentleman has been making for years, and he is making it when running for governor out in Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. I am not running for Governor of the State of Texas, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask one question of the gentleman from Texas. Am I to be a member of the entertainment committee?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not know of a better one they could place on such a committee, I will say to my friend, and it would not be a junket if the gentleman was there.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK of Texas) there were—ayes 23, noes 52.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, and make the point there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 235, not voting, 99, as follows:

A motion by Mr. LINTHICUM to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill. Pending that, I wonder if we can not limit general debate. From conversation I have had with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] I find that we both have requests for about five hours' further general debate. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be continued for five hours, to be controlled as heretofore by the gentleman from Kansas and myself.

Mr. AYRES. Will not the gentleman modify his request and make it not exceeding five hours?

Mr. FRENCH. Not exceeding five hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the time for further general debate be limited to not exceeding five hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if it is expected to continue with this bill to-morrow?

Mr. FRENCH. My understanding is that we will continue to-morrow.

The motion of Mr. FRENCH was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] 15 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, one of the most amazing developments since the limitation of the naval armament conference of 1921–22 has been the consistent and persistent attacks to undermine the confidence of the American public in the accomplishments of that conference. In my opinion the treaty of Washington for the limitation of armament in 1921–22 was the greatest step forward in the direction of peace and understanding since the armistice. [Applause.]

However, for reasons that are hard to explain, attempts have been made and are still being made by professional big-navy men to make the people of this country believe that we sacrificed our Navy, that we scrapped our ships and other nations did not scrap theirs, that our interests were betrayed by former Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes, and that we conceded everything and got nothing in return. It is time that the noise and propaganda of the Navy jingoes should be answered and that the motive of the attacks should no longer be concealed from the public.

Now, what are the facts? The facts are that for the first time in the naval history of Great Britain she agreed to recognize our demand as a great industrial and exporting nation to equality on the high seas, and thereby prevented competitive building of capital ships. The acceptance of the 5–5–3 ratio by Great Britain meant that as far as battleships and battle cruisers were concerned, and all other naval vessels above 10,000 tons, there should be a parity between the United States and Great Britain.

In the six years that have gone by since that conference was ratified the Government of the United States has saved one and one-half billion dollars, or approximately $250,000,000 a year, on the proposed building program and the maintenance which would have been necessary for the ships that were scrapped and for those that were on the proposed naval program.

That is only a matter of finance, but the Coolidge program of economy would have been a myth without the ratification of the Washington limitation of naval armament. If we had continued with the proposed program of $250,000,000 a year there would have been no tax reduction. But the biggest thing about that conference was the fact that overnight when we adopted the 5–5–3 ratio all thought of war and talk of war between Japan and the United States disappeared. [Applause.]

At that time and prior to it the papers were filled with all kinds of jingoistic propositions about the danger of war between Japan and the United States. Almost overnight the situation changed and the papers now rarely contain any reference to the possibility of war with Japan. Those are the outstanding results of the Washington conference, which has done so much for the peace of the world. Notwithstanding the facts the big-navy men on every occasion have continued to denounce the naval limitation conference and have tried to make the public believe that we have betrayed our own best interests. The criticism has been so rampant that a former admiral of our Navy went as far as accusing Mr. Hughes of being a pacifist. What is it they want? What do they mean? Do they mean that they wanted the United States to proceed and build the biggest navy in the world, to enter into competition with Great Britain to build more of these $40,000,000 battleships? Why, it seems to be taken for granted by those gentlemen of the big-navy persuasion that we could have gone ahead and built the biggest navy, the biggest number of battleships and battle cruisers, and that Great Britain would have made no effort to compete with us. You must remember that Great Britain has $18,000,000,000 invested in foreign countries and the United States only has $13,000,000,000 invested.

Is it conceivable that in any race for naval armament between the United States and Great Britain that she would have failed to continue to build these big battleships? Of course not. I do not like to make predictions—fools rush in where angels fear to tread—but I predict that within 50 years the limitation of naval armament conference of 1921–22 which established the 5–5–3 ratio will be regarded as the most important event in our day and generation since the World War.

Under that agreement it is proposed that we should have a new limitation of armament conference in 1931–32, and instead of replacing these battleships on the 5–5–3 ratio which provided for 18 battleships over 10,000 tons each, for England and the United States, and 10 for Japan, I suggest for respectful consideration when this new conference comes around, and it may be reached before 1931, that we do not replace those battleships, but that we reduce by one-half that number, making it 9 instead of 18 for Great Britain and the United States and a proportional reduction for Japan on the same 5–5–3 ratio. We would then have identically the same amount of protection, the same amount of national defense, if it was accomplished proportionately, and we would save to the taxpayers of this country $400,000,000 in replacements, and $20,000,000 annually in maintenance for the battleships that are not replaced.

I thought some Member of the House should answer the statements made in the House that the Limitation of Naval Armament Conference was a farce. That assertion was made not only by the big-navy men, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], but it was made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE], who stated that limitation of naval armament of 1921–22 was a farce.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No; I have not the time. I am sorry. If I get through I shall be glad to yield. Unfortunately, the Washington Limitation of Armament Conference did not include the so-called light cruisers under 10,000 tons. Those cruisers are misnomers. They are not light cruisers at all. They cost as much as battleships cost before the war. Their 8-inch guns are as powerful and hard hitting as the 12-inch guns on battleships before the war. They have a speed of 35 knots, which is far in excess of battleships before 1914.

Mr. FRENCH. And cost twice as much.

Mr. FISH. Unfortunately, we were unable—England, Japan, and the United States—to come to an agreement on a 5–5–3 basis for the limitation of these so-called light cruisers, which really should be known as the Washington type of cruisers. England went ahead immediately after the conference to build up her cruisers of 10,000 tons, not in violation of the letter or the spirit of the conference, because no agreement was reached upon that.

A year ago I introduced a resolution in the House carrying out the request of the President, providing for an appropriation of $75,000 to send delegates to the preparatory commission on disarmament to be held in Geneva under the auspices of the League of Nations. That conference was a misnomer. It was not a disarmament conference. It was not even a limitation of armament conference. It was a conference composed of a score of nations under the auspices of the League of Nations, many of whom have no navies at all, to discuss a sort of general disarmament, or, rather, an agenda for a general limitation of land, sea, and air armaments. The Members of the House took occasion to say in advance that there would be no useful result from that conference. I had to defend it on the floor of the House, and I made the statement then, which I repeat now, that we had to attend it as a matter of good faith or we could have been justly accused of not being sincere in our efforts to limit naval armaments. What happened? The conference was held. These little nations, with no navy at all, got together and blocked any proposition that had to do with the limitation of naval armament. As a consequence of the failure, the President of the United States called a conference at Geneva of Great Britain, Japan, the United States, Italy, and France. Italy and France refused, but sent observers.

The United States' delegates went to this conference to try to extend the 5–5–3 ratio to auxiliary vessels. They carried out the orders of the President. They did everything in their power to reach an agreement on the 5–5–3 basis for auxiliary vessels, but failed through no fault of their own. The main point on which the conference broke up was the insistence of the British delegates that the 8-inch guns be scrapped and 6-inch guns be adopted. That would have meant that Great Britain could have armed all her merchant marine with 6-inch guns and thus controlled the seas for generations to come. The limitation of armament conference of 1921–22 specifically provided that cruisers under 10,000 tons could have 8-inch guns, and naturally we were not going to concede any change to Great Britain, because we realized in advance that, with her control of merchant ships, if we did concede that, there was no use of discussing any more the question of light cruisers, because England could convert her entire merchant marine into light cruisers with 6-inch guns. I want to take this opportunity to put into the RECORD a letter written by Lord Cecil, one of the British delegates, who places the entire blame for the failure of the three-power naval conference not upon the American delegates, as stated by some Members of this House, but solely upon the British cabinet. [Applause.]

I am going to read from Lord Cecil's letter to the London Times extracts which appeared in American newspapers:

"To judge by the debate in the House of Commons," he says, "there seems still some doubt as what actually occurred in the three-power conference at Geneva last summer," and then requests the privilege of restating the case "as I know it."

BRITISH-JAPANESE PROPOSALS

"After prolonged negotiations, the British delegates, in agreement with the Japanese made certain proposals," writes Lord Cecil. "These comprised a figure for the total tonnage of cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, and the limitation of 10,000-ton cruisers for the British and Americans to 15 or less, with a proportionate number for the Japanese."

I want the chairman of the Subcommittee on Naval Affairs to take note of "to 15." Further:

So far the Americans said they saw no insuperable objection to an agreement—which, in diplomatic language, meant they would agree if they could get nothing better. The British also proposed that cruisers other than 10,000 tonners should be limited to 6,000 tons, carrying 6-inch guns. This the Americans rejected. They wanted 8,000-ton cruisers instead 6,000 and 8-inch guns instead of 6-inch. I disagreed with the Americans, but I thought the difference far too small to justify a breakdown to the negotiations.

QUESTION OF COMPROMISE

In any case, though, a compromise should be attempted, and on this point Mr. Bridgeman and I were absolutely as one. Accordingly we made three proposals successively. The first suggested that we should seek to limit the agreement to the year 1931, since till that date the Americans would be fully occupied in catching up with our built or building 10,000 tonners. Next we proposed a compromise on the basis of 7-inch guns. Thirdly, we urged that the question of the caliber of the guns for second-class cruisers might be left unsettled—it could not become actual for the United States for some years—on the understanding that if the United States definitely decided to build cruisers carrying 8-inch guns other than the 10,000 tonners, they should give us notice and a further conference could be held if we so desired. I thought and think that there was a very good chance that this would have been accepted.

ALL COMPROMISE REJECTED

All these suggestions of a compromise were rejected by the cabinet, though both Mr. Bridgeman and I supported them.

[Applause.]

I believe the attacks made on Ambassador Gibson, Admiral Hilary Jones, and the American delegates by Members of Congress for the failure of the three-power naval conference held last summer at Geneva to be most unfair and not warranted by the facts. It can be most emphatically stated that the American delegates conformed in all respects to the treaty of Washington and made every effort to extend the 5–5–3 ratio to light cruisers and auxiliary vessels.

I am not one of those who delight in twisting the lion's tail simply to hear him roar. I believe in cordial good will and friendship between the two great English-speaking countries, but I can not escape the conclusion that the British cabinet committed a serious blunder, and a blunder is often worse than a crime, by overreaching in their demands, and are largely to blame for the approaching competition between the three great naval powers as regards the building of light cruisers. Although I can not conceive of war between Great Britain and the United States under any circumstances, yet competitive armaments have always been the greatest factor in creating misunderstandings, suspicion, and enmity between nations. Let us hope that this misunderstanding can soon be rectified, or at least let us strive toward that objective by showing our good faith and willingness to enter into another conference.

It must be obvious to anyone who has read Lord Cecil's letter to the London Times that the blame for the failure to reach an agreement to limit light cruisers rests entirely upon the British Government. Lord Cecil, who was one of the British delegates, expressly states that the cabinet directed him and his colleague, W. C. Bridgeman, the First Lord of the Admiralty, to offer no compromise on the 8-inch gun question. Lord Cecil further states that three other suggestions for a compromise were rejected by the cabinet, "though both Mr. Bridgeman and I supported them."

The apparent Nelsonian attitude on the part of the British cabinet, backed by an age-long tradition of Britannia rules the waves and supported by a Tory government, made an agreement based on a numerical or tonnage parity for light cruisers, evidently too much to be expected in spite of the mutual desire of both the American and British people. The blame for the failure to reach an agreement to limit light cruisers rests not on the American delegates but squarely on the British Government, and there is no escape from this conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, in considering the naval appropriation bill and its provisions we can not escape giving some thought to the situation in Nicaragua. The bill itself provides a large appropriation for the maintenance of our marines in that Republic. We know that a general election is to be held, under the supervision, if you please, of an American Army general, to be assisted in the supervision and manning of the polls by armed marines.

Last year I had the matter up with the Secretary of State, and I suggested that if the people of Nicaragua asked for some supervision and assistance in the matter of their election, in that event the Secretary of War should find volunteers, men and women of the United States, who could go down there and give the people the assistance that they may request.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that in my time the Clerk read the letter which I have this day written to the Secretary of State along those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARCH 23, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On October 5, 1927, I took the liberty to write and suggest that if the United States were to supervise the general election in the Republic of Nicaragua, such supervision should be conducted by civilians and not by a military force.

You were good enough to write me on October 6, 1927, that the idea which I put forward "had already suggested itself to the department and will certainly receive most serious consideration."

According to news items it would appear that entire supervision has been placed in the hands of a general of the Army, and the plans call for the use of armed marines to supervise, assist, and otherwise control the election.

Permit me to state, Mr. Secretary, that universal suffrage and the secret ballot are absolutely inconsistent with uniformed marines and fixed bayonets. The two can not be harmonized. It is still possible to rehabilitate the confidence of the people of Nicaragua in the United States Government. If there is to be a supervision of the election, if a request should come from all parties interested, then why not select a group of civilian volunteers, experienced, disinterested, and unarmed. Such a change would surely have a wholesome effect on the people of Central America.

In this instance, strange as it may seem, it is the majority of the people of Nicaragua who desire protection at the polls, an honest election, and a fair count.

I beg serious consideration to this suggestion. It means a great deal to the peace and contentment of the Western Hemisphere. This is the opportunity where we can render real service to Nicaraguans if they really desire assistance in their election and specifically ask for it. In that event, let a group of American men and women go down who have not been spoiled by diplomatic training and who would cheerfully go to their tasks open-mindedly and whole-heartedly and not goose step to the polls armed to the teeth.

I am, sir,

Sincerely yours,

F. LAGUARDIA.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have the assurance that the gentleman can have more time. We are considering an appropriation bill. I have endeavored to ascertain what extraordinary expense has been incurred consequent upon our proceedings in Nicaragua. Has the gentleman information on that point?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand that the last deficiency bill carried a million dollars, and if my information is correct they did not desire to go into detail at that time because they did not know how much cost the expeditionary force in Nicaragua would entail.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that last year, in February, 1927, I wrote the Secretary of the Navy with reference to the cost of what we were doing in Nicaragua, and I had a letter from him under date February 10, 1927, from which I quote:

Referring to the expense to which this Government is put on the coast and in the territory of Nicaragua, there is no added monetary expense because of the present employment of these naval forces, since the cost of their pay and provisions is already a fixed charge, and the amount of fuel consumed is probably about the same as would be used in the usual activities of the ships in cruising and training.

Now, as I understand, we are told that the expense has ran into several million dollars, due to our activities there. My own view is without contesting the principle of protecting American lives and property, that the great original mistake made by our Government was in sending such an enormous force to Nicaragua and the coast of Nicaragua. In this very letter of February 10, 1927, the Secretary states that at that time there were 13 vessels in Nicaraguan waters, with 176 officers and 2,272 men. My own firm conviction is that much of the trouble we have had and much of the trouble we are having now is due to the tremendous and unnecessary display of force which we made when we started our present course in the latter part of 1926.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is absolutely correct. But aside from that, aside from the matter of cost there is a great principle involved here, and that is that the people of a sovereign state, the free citizens of a republic, are entitled to conduct their own elections without the supervision of an armed force of another country. [Applause.]

There are means and ways of protecting American property, assuming that American property is endangered, and there are means and ways of protecting American lives, assuming that they are endangered; but I submit that there is no justification for using the pretense of protecting American life and property by sending an armed force down to control the election of a free people in a republic.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let me say further that in the Wilson administration and in the Harding administration it was found entirely sufficient to send a small body of marines there. But as soon as we gave the situation an aspect of real war the psychological effect was most unfortunate. Resentment and hatred were stirred and conditions rapidly went from bad to worse, and what has happened I need not rehearse. The picture is one no one can view with satisfaction.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say that the fallacy of using the armed forces of the United States in interfering with the internal affairs of the sister Republics on the Western Hemisphere is bipartisan, because the conduct of the Wilson administration in the occupation of Haiti was as outrageous, as uncalled for, and as unnecessary as our present attitude in Nicaragua.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman makes it appear that we are going down there of our own volition to impose force upon those people. Is it not true and ought not the gentleman to state that we are going down there upon the invitation of the responsible government, and that we are going down there to help them?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If there is a responsible government, then we have no business there. It was stated here that we sent marines down there because there was no responsible government. You can not have the two.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. On the invitation of an irresponsible government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If it is on the invitation of an irresponsible government, then give them the assistance that they ask for, a fair, impartial supervision of their polls by means of civilians and not by fixed bayonets and bombing planes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Has there been any loss of American lives there except among the marines?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course not; but that is inevitable. If you start a fight you are bound to invite a return fire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], a member of the committee.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I think what the gentleman from New York has said calls for a statement of what the facts are and what the situation is in Nicaragua. I think the people of this country should know and understand what it is.

From 1912 down to August, 1925, we had 100 marines in Nicaragua. There was not any trouble just as long as they stayed there. We took them out in August, 1925, and in September following, trouble began. In response to requests in the fall of 1926 from American citizens made to the State Department for the protection of their life and their property we sent some marines down there. We sent marines because we can send marines into another country without getting into war.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Answering the gentleman from New York, what would a lot of picnickers do down there without a gun?

Mr. TABER. They could not do anything except, perhaps, to aid a revolution.

Mr. HERSEY. That is right.

Mr. TABER. And that is the kind of folks who would go down there and it would make more trouble instead of less trouble.

Here is the situation a little further: Former Secretary of War Stimson went down there last summer and all the factions got together; they agreed they would lay down their arms if the United States would take charge of the election and see that it was put through on the square. The United States agreed to do this. Things began to quiet down; almost all of the different revolutionary groups came in and laid down their arms and the situation looked as though we were able to withdraw some of our troops and they took quite a group of our marines away from there. Then some more of these bandits broke loose and began to make attacks on the American marines and not the marines upon them. That called for more troops, and that is why we have more down there now.

Our country, in good faith to the world, in good faith to itself and for the sake of the preservation of peace, must do nothing else than to see that they have a fair election down there. We do not want to send there a lot of people who will volunteer to go down as civilians, who would be powerless to carry out our promises. We want to see that our promise to those people is carried out and that there is a square election in Nicaragua. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman stated we could send armed marines into Nicaragua and have them take the action they have taken without getting into a state of war?

Mr. TABER. Why, certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can the gentleman suggest any rule of international law that permits one country to send an armed force, even if you call them marines, into another country, take control of the government, become engaged in an armed conflict and not call it war?

Mr. TABER. That has always been so.

Mr. WINTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WINTER. We are there on the invitation of all parties for that purpose?

Mr. TABER. Absolutely.

Mr. WINTER. We are not there of our own will but we are there upon the invitation of all parties concerned.

Mr. TABER. That is just it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. After you have an election under those circumstances how long will it hold?

Mr. TABER. If we do not take charge of the election and see that it is on the square, I am fearful that conditions will rapidly become worse and no one can tell what serious consequences will follow. If the election is honestly supervised, as we have promised, I am hopeful orderly government will proceed and that our marines may withdraw.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is it the purpose of the administration to make poll holders out of the marines and have them act in that capacity down there with guns?

Mr. TABER. The marines are there to see that there is a fair election.

Mr. ABERNETHY. In other words, the registrars and poll holders will be marines with guns?

Mr. TABER. That is not so. The marines will simply see that the election is honestly conducted.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I simply want to say that I am glad the Republican Party is converted to honest elections—even in Nicaragua.

Mr. TABER. Is the gentleman in favor of honest elections in New York City?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Surely; and always have been.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We need the marines down there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SEARS].

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad to help turn from the smaller questions of war to the more important ones of peace, realizing that questions of marines in Nicaragua and Haiti have but small relation to the material welfare of the United States in comparison with the questions that I shall discuss with you and those which you have had largely in your minds for some time.

I want you to notice this little map here [indicating], because I am going to refer to the subject matter of it. The yellow portion represents the semiarid section of the United States, superimposed on a map of the United States. The brown portion represents the flooded section of last year. The yellow portion is about 244,000,000 acres, and the flooded portion some 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 acres. This portion [indicating] has a capacity to hold at least 2 or 3 feet of water, and the number of rivers that pass over it that can help to make a flood is innumerable. The semiarid portion has never been wet down since the white man has been there, and probably for several thousand years before that time.

This country has always been afflicted with droughts and floods. I am going to deal with droughts and floods especially with reference to that great territory between the Rockies and the Alleghenies known as the Mississippi Valley watershed. From each of these mountain ranges tending toward the central and south sweep the congested waters from the smaller flood areas and together make the immense problems of flooding, that at times call forth the largest of type in our papers, in declaring the sum total of human suffering and money damage occasioned by the great concentration.

And then, throughout this entire district there is not a county but that at some time during the year needs more water for agricultural and domestic uses. No more water falls by rain and snow than is needed for those purposes.

East of the mountains on the west side there is an especially large district known as semiarid. It is approximately 2,000 miles long and 350 miles wide. Contrary to the course of the waters forming at the northward and rushing to a common center at the Gulf, hot winds form at the south end of this strip and extend their influence clear into Canada. Times over, the amount of damage occasioned by the floods is the damage occasioned by the droughts. The flood is more spectacular. People are killed outright by the floods. Buildings and stock are washed away by them. People are gathered together in high places in tents and box cars by the hundreds of thousands. Livestock and growing crops are carried along with houses, fences, and all that is within its path. All these things get into the headlines of the papers. And the accounts following the headlines are glowing and known to all the readers of the press. But the drought creeps on day after day until the culmination of the hot winds destroy the growing crops and the pasturage, and the farmer knows that he has lost another year out of his existence, except that he must go still further into debt, and the interest money will pile up day and night.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Yes; just for a moment.

Mr. GARBER. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that it would be very interesting to call attention to the soil of the semiarid plains region and to note that some day it will be perhaps the most prolific and the most productive section of the United States.

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Yes; it is a wonderful soil.

Where the drought is extensive because of its far-reaching effect, bankers and business men fail because the farmer has failed that year, and often his farm passes to the real title holder, the mortgagee.

Wherever large watercourses meet there may be expected a great flood. It was so at Kansas City, Pittsburgh, Sioux City, and others might be stated. Dayton is in a place of danger; Cairo, Little Rock, many others might be named, including, of course, New Orleans. In fact, wherever there is a low place of a great watershed there is a place of danger.

The floods last year on the Red, White, Arkansas, St. Francis, with the help of waters from the Missouri, Mississippi, Ohio, and their tributaries, occasioned probably four or five hundred million dollars damage. In the neighborhood of 300 lives were lost. Many business men, bankers, farmers, were ruined, because of the immediate and after effects of the floods. This loss of life and of damage was in spite of the fact that everyone knows, who has given the matter thought, that all of the waters that might be called crests of the flood waters were needed in the watersheds where they originated, and because of the lack of foresight and good business judgment they were allowed to escape and run wild. The question arises, Why have these waters so badly needed where they are precipitated, been allowed to so escape and run away and cause such havoc? The answer is very simple. We have no intelligent, disinterested officers to study and take leadership in these questions of drought and flood control. The question at once comes, Have we not turned these lines of inquiry over to our engineers to study and report and take leadership on these matters? The answer is also very simple. Yes; but they have not been properly educated in the right kind of engineering as many civil engineers have. And there is no place for growth in Army engineering on strictly civil engineering lines. And there is much of snobbery in Army engineering, and there has been much of Army life prejudice, and not an open-mindedness in our Army engineers.

They have had handed down to them old lines of thought, and intrenched themselves anew in their old ditches. Apparently they have had little use for the welfare of the citizen and his problem. They have refused to consider even those problems that were submitted to them for solving, those related to kindred and required civil engineering.

Now, these are pretty severe indictments, are they not? Yes; and they should not lightly be made, and would not be at this time at all were it possible to discuss the questions that relate to the storage and uses of water without doing so.

I make this bold assertion that it has been the policy of the Government adopted by Congress for a number of years past, when surveys for a district were called for, to demand from these engineering servants of ours a report as to navigation, flood control, agricultural uses of water and power. I make this bold statement, which I shall seek to prove later in this address, that the Army engineers deliberately avoided the interests of the American people because of the influence in some relation to their concerted hostility to the reservoir system of flood control and its benefits, and I will bring the question down very closely to the influence of the growing power control in and of the United States. Necessarily, I will have to be somewhat at random, but still attempting something of a coherency in the discussion. I will reserve the question of lack of duty to the latter part of this argumentation. We start out with the fact of floods, and of the further fact that owing to the startling nature of the 1927 floods there was a wholesome and general demand for comprehensive flood control legislation. Now, what was the meaning of that demand? Was it that we should concentrate the Nation's wealth and efforts to fix on the country a perpetual flood system? Were the floods from the West and the North and the East to be welcomed and concentrated, and then by gigantic effort spewed into the Gulf of Mexico? No; it was not that. That would not be flood control. The demand was, if possible, that there should be a doing away with floods. That there should not be any need of throwing out into the Gulf, because, if possible, these waters were by the composite thought of the people of the country intended not to form devastating floods. This is not a new question. For years the people of this country have had an abiding faith in a great system of reservoir control of flood waters and in putting them to practical uses for mankind. There have been many heroes in the fight for conservation of our water resources. Who does not know, in public or private life, of the years of great effort of Senator Newlands, which finally culminated in apparent victory for reservoir flood control?

Who has not known of the secret murder of that law after Senator Newlands's death? Who has not heard of the cry of anguish going up from nearly a million throats in the flooded districts, not for a spewing out into the Gulf, but for a doing away of the eternal flood threat? Who has not heard of the cry of distress of the people in the Great Plains country, when the blighting hot winds from the south were not tempered by the waters that rushed by, and which cries were for help from a condition, and not a theory? Two years ago the drought in the Great Plains country cost that section at least a billion and a half dollars, besides resulting in great consequential damages to bankers and business men. The pastures burned. Small grain was only in part harvested, and then with small result. A great deal of corn was not even cut for fodder. Many herds of fine dairy cattle were shipped to the stockyards because the owner could not afford to ship in feed by railroad to winter them over. Every intelligent man, who has given an intelligent study to the questions of flood and drought control, knows that there is but one system of drought and flood control, and that is the reservoir system. One of the most eminent engineers that this country has ever produced—I refer to Mr. Stevens—has said on one of these great related questions:

I have not read in detail the report of the reservoir board, but it seems inconceivable to my mind that in many thousand miles of tributaries, large and small, on the Mississippi River, that some way can not be found or there should not be found at least one where a reservoir can not be put in which will materially afford some relief from flood control. I do not say that it can not. My mind is open. I do not know, but it looks singular to me. I do not believe the reservoir board, which went into the question, I think, in June, 1927, could possibly have studied, at least to any extent or detail, the possibilities of the reservoir system.

Again:

You asked why I think the proper time has not elapsed. I answer by saying from very high authority that I had it on the 15th day of June, 1927, that much data remained to be collected before a plan could be evolved.

On the same authority, on August 30 and September 16, I was advised that this data had not been collected. Presumably, then, after that date, possibly as late as October 1, the data were collected, or supposed to be, which allowed from that time until the end of November to prepare a plan. Now, I can not conceive, with my wide experience with engineers, extending over half a century, that any body of men, with the additional data that could be collected within four or five months, can in six weeks or two months prepare plans which will cover all possible future contingencies on the Mississippi River.

I will here state that Mr. Stevens used the Mississippi River as synonymous with the great watershed.

A quotation from Mr. Grunsky, the noted hydraulic engineer, who—and the same may be also said of Mr. Stevens—is a past president of the American Society of Civil Engineers:

Reservoirs should be constructed in practically or on practically every stream in the United States. There is no natural resource which the country has which is of greater value than our waters; and the United States, wherever a river is an international river, an interstate river, or a navigable river, should make a plan for the regulation of the stream and should pay for the cost of carrying out the work of regulating whenever it is shown to be economic, feasible, and timely. I think this is fundamental.

Probably the closest student of reservoir control that we have in the United States is George H. Maxwell. Engineers throughout the country regard him as an authority as to this branch of engineering. He is absolutely satisfied that floods are an unnecessary condition except in local instances. Professor Mickey, who also appeared before the committee, has been a student of these questions for many years. He is head of the civil engineering department of the University of Nebraska. He is well satisfied that the impounding of flood waters in the different flood areas where they originate will do away with great floods and that the utilization for the purposes of mankind will do away with great droughts. Mr. Blake, who has studied these questions for 16 years in connection with the Arkansas and Canadian Rivers, is well satisfied that from every standpoint the impounding of waters in the originating flood areas is absolutely practical from every standpoint, not only to the most economical, but highly beneficial to the Nation at large.

Taft, Roosevelt, and Wilson have all urged the impounding of water, the application of their uses, and the prevention of their unbridled damage.

Perhaps I should state some of the benefits from reservoir control outside of the prevention of floods: Waters will have great uses all over the watersheds, but especially in the Great Plains. There will be found 244,000,000 acres of land, at least half of which so lies that water from the rivers, after impounding, can be placed upon and into them. The capacity of this soil to hold water is at least 2 feet of water to the acre. The land of this strip has never been wet down since the white man has been there. The reason for the destruction of the crops is because of lack of subsoil moisture. The land lies with a substantial drop to the east and south, by reason of which water from the reservoirs can be readily turned upon it. One good wetting down a year will mean a good crop the next season. The reservoirs there situated, if the water supply is unusual, can be emptied two or three times, and thereby have the greater capacity to take up water. But waters will have value that will be very largely reimbursive in every section of the United States. Another benefit from the impounding by reservoir of waters will be found in some instances where power may be developed, and will, the same as in many of the agricultural districts, entirely reimburse the Government and minister to the welfare of the people. Another benefit will be to the navigation of our rivers. All of our navigable rivers suffer more or less from low water unless they are affected by tidewater. With reservoir control the water will be taken out of the river at flood time—that is, the crest of the floods—and as much more as is necessary; this, of course, in the early high-water season generally. It will be returned to the rivers in the low-water months, thus bringing stability to the flow of our waters. The only thing that the lower Mississippi needs for navigation is the low-water month supply of additional water.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. At what point would you build the dams to control the waters?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Wherever that is necessary. There are reservoir sites in every watershed.

When the water is applied to the soil it comes back by way of a thousand springs, thus removing the force of the flood and adding to the low-water period. Let me give you an illustration of a western river. I refer to the Platte in Nebraska and Wyoming. There the Pathfinder Dam, costing a little over a million dollars, has a capacity of a million acre-feet of water. Waters from the dam are carried to Scotts Bluff County, Nebr. The beneficial effects to the soil may be stated as raising the valuation of the county from $800,000 to about $40,000,000. Its effect on the river has been to take out 45 per cent of the river at high-water period, and to add 47 per cent in the low-water period, and to prevent over 700,000 acre-feet from getting into the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers at all. Another benefit will be by reason of taking out the rushing flood waters to largely stop erosion into the rivers from the soil. Each year about a billion cubic yards of silt starts from the farms by way of erosions on its way to the Gulf. About that amount goes each year into the Gulf. No one knows just how much, but approximately. With the stoppage of erosion the rivers will have more capacity each year for the carrying off of the water and be able to function with greater effect. This speech presumes that each of the hearers has read Judge DRIVER'S report to the Flood Control Committee from the reservoir subcommittee. Its argument I regard as unanswerable. Anyone desiring to read it who, unfortunately, has not will be given a copy on asking, of course, as long as my supply lasts. This report absolutely proves that all of the rivers that lead into the lower Mississippi River may be so controlled that they will have no more water from Cape Girardeau to Cairo down than they want for agriculture and navigation. The river at Cairo by taking out 720,000 cubic feet a second, which is absolutely practical, from the rivers that feed into it, for a few days, may be reduced at that point 12 feet, thus not only relieving the river to its easy capacity, but making Cairo absolutely safe and draining southern Illinois. By reservoir impounding of the Red, White, and Arkansas, not only will those sections be made entirely safe but the lower valley will be absolutely saved to agriculture and permanent navigation. Now, with all these benefits to be derived from flood control by the reservoir plan, what can we say of the benefits to be derived from any of the Jadwin, Potter, or Jones plans? Not a solitary thing or advantage. Will the cost be any cheaper by any of those plans than by the reservoir plan? No free-minded man so takes it.

All of the friends of reservoir control believe that we can have that ample control with an outlay within $600,000,000. Each one of those who, on investigation have favored the reservoir plan, believe that at least two-thirds and perhaps more will be reimbursive by the sale of water and by the sale of the reservoirs themselves, which in many instances can be effected, and the Government still maintain control over the reservoirs for flood-control purposes. If so, the net expense to the Government will be $200,000,000, and no great floods anywhere in the valley. What will be the prospective expense or outlay by reason of the adoption of any of the Jadwin, Potter, or Jones plan? There is practically no difference in any of them. Eventually the same treatment must follow up the main tributaries of higher levees and more revetment work. No one believes that any one of these plans can be carried out for anything like a billion dollars. When completed, there will be an annual upkeep charge of at least $25,000,000 a year. And some years a good deal more. Now, the $25,000,000 a year upkeep charge is the same as an interest charge on more than $600,000,000 of dead capital in addition. And it is all dead capital. There is no reimbursement anywhere; and while these works at such enormous expense are spewing this great national asset of ours out into the Gulf is there any assurance of stability? No; not any. Their own works provide for disaster, expect it, and anticipate it, and seek to throw that burden of damage occasioned by their premeditated damaging waters onto the States where their intended breaks take place. What effect will their plans have on the lower valley? Let us keep in mind as we make this inquiry that the reservoir-control system is intended to benefit every community where reservoir control is to be exercised. Again, let me ask, what will the effect of any of these hellish plans be on the innocent bystander? Well, one thing it is going to do is to make the few that remain sleep every once in a while on the high ground again. They will not keep their families there nor their cattle nor their horses. They will not have their pigs or chickens. They will not build even any houses there without the consent of General Jadwin or his successors in the office, because it may interfere with the Government's use of these flood waters, and such act may be followed not only by a fine but imprisonment. It is going to cause a second exodus of the Acadians, descendants of those that Longfellow wrote about in his beautiful "Evangeline." They are mostly gathered together down there in the old community, the place where they were dumped off by the British when they were carried away from Nova Scotia.

Their home country where they have lived so long is to be used for water run-off purposes and dedicated to muskrats and moccasin snakes, and they are going to have a second exodus. Fifty-five thousand people are going to be driven away from home, while about 6,000,000 acres which should be dedicated to the best of agricultural and rural life are going to be turned into swamps. Around 13 or 14 cities and villages are to be ruined. Some 400 miles of paved and improved highways will have to be built over again. Many miles of railroads must be elevated. Churches, schoolhouses, telephone systems are to be despoiled. Many districts that are heavily bonded will have a double burden put on the little good land remaining. And for what? To satisfy the obstinacy or the cupidity of one man on men who do not care for the pulsing of the human heart.

I came from a section of the country that may be called the "lost country." Up in Nebraska. That is in the Great Plains country. The country of the heavy products, the long hauls, and the high freight rates. No part of the United States can thrive without navigation. With navigation they will get a low rate. Without navigation, the producers will pay for the low rate given those who have it. The railroads of the Northwest so far have been able to prevent the improvement of the Missouri River, and so we do not get the reduced competitive rates but pay extra to make up for those who do. The great western railroads are owned by those in close implication who own the great western power companies. Stick a pin in either and the other also feels the pain. The power companies are determined that reservoirs of any kind shall not be constructed, even for flood control. They fear that such flood-control reservoirs will develop into power plants. We have Army engineers who look to graduation from their department to find fat jobs of management in power companies. The question is, Can a man serve two masters? Let us look at the situation a moment and see if the American people have had a square deal. Let us see if the people who believe in the reservoir control of flood and droughts have had a square deal. If they have, then anything is a square deal. The Army officers and the power companies both have been opposed to reservoir flood control. Not all of them, but it is fair to say a great many of them. General Jadwin has made a strenuous effort to retain power and authority in his hands over the questions I am now discussing.

Following the great flood's development he was in the forefront reaching out for authority. At the great Chicago convention he was there, and the resolutions as first prepared had no word of comfort for reservoir control. A threat was made to take the question out on the floor, and a promise was made looking to some degree of hope to be held out to those in favor of reservoir flood control. At once after that convention General Jadwin named the committee or commission, rather, to inquire and report as to the value of reservoir flood control, and he placed Colonel Kelly at the head of the commission. Who is Colonel Kelly? Why, he was one of the brightest, if not the brightest, of the Army engineers. Several years ago he was in communication with the power companies that do business in New York and Canada looking to a place of control and management as the result of meditated employment. He asked leave for retirement. It was refused him, as he had not reached the age of retirement yet. He then asked for an indefinite leave of absence, and it was accorded him at half pay, which he is still drawing. He at once took up his employment at a much higher rate of salary with the power company. The question arises, Can a man serve two masters? General Jadwin knew that the one paying Colonel Kelly the least salary was the United States of America. He knew of the battle of power companies against reservoirs, yet he appointed Colonel Kelly to that place.

I may tell you here of some farmers who tried to add a power plant to the Guernsey Dam for their own use. An injunction was brought against them by the power people, and the judge only last week dissolved the temporary injunction. It was their own capital, and their own property was bonded for the entire debt. The whole system had been running there as a reservoir-control proposition. They built the new Guernsey Dam for storage purposes and started to use the power, and they were faced with an injunction from these same people.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I regret I did not hear the earlier part of the gentleman's discourse, but could the gentleman tell us briefly what were the conclusions of Colonel Kelly in his report?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman renew that question at the end of my remarks if he does not find it covered?

Mr. CARTER. I will be very pleased to do so.

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. I will say that every engineer, including Colonel Kelly and all the rest, agrees that the ideal control is reservoir control. Apparently one might have expected a favorable report from Colonel Kelly's commission if there had not been the question of expense. They had no report on a single reservoir or on any group of reservoirs that would justify them in making a statement about them. To show to what extent this is true, I asked one of them if he did not favor reservoir control. He said, "Yes; except for the terrible expense." I asked, "How much do you think it will cost?" and he replied, "Billions and billions of dollars." I said, "Will you give us some data that will go to make up the sum total of your billions and billions?" He would not. A few days later I renewed the question when he was on the stand, and he came down to $1,200,000. That may have been for all the north country not taking in the Arkansas and the Red, but it was all guesswork.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Right in connection with the reservoir system of control, which I assume is indorsed by the common sense of all who have investigated and thought about the question, will the gentleman develop somewhere in his very able speech the constitutional authority to couple up and warrant the reservoir control as a part of one general, national program of flood relief and conservation?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. I can not do that right here because I have not the time to discuss it. I simply take it for granted that the authority is there. If I had more time, I would be very glad to develop that.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. No; I will not. There is no man in all the world to whom I would rather yield, but I am not going to have time to finish what I want to say.

The investigation and report of the reservoir commission, of course, was a farce. It was expected to be a farce when he was appointed. During the time that the commission was investigating, or pretending to investigate, the sites, the southern Appalachian power conference was held, being a convention of kindred souls, if corporations have souls, engaged in the power business. Resolutions were passed demanding that the Government work of flood control should be confined to the lower stem of the Mississippi. The report of Colonel Kelly's commission was a fraud on the American people—at least against the welfare of the American people and its great remaining asset. It pretended to report on something like 500 reservoirs. As a matter of fact, it did not have proper data as to a single one. No effort was made to get in touch with those who knew, with State engineers or university engineers that knew of the watersheds of their respective States. Some reservoirs picked out as available for sites were known to be absolutely unfitted, and others that were available as valuable prospective sites for flood control were passed up without mention. General Jadwin knew that their old-fool ideas of levee protection had to be junked, and said so to the Flood Control Committee. In his heart he knew that those ideas of levees only were chargeable with the great flood-water damages and death losses, yet he clung tenaciously to his opposition to flood control by way of reservoirs. After years of failure on levees only, and after being compelled to junk his past theory with reference to them, which no one would swallow any longer and which there was a general revolt against, he refused even to consider reservoirs, with their wonderful beneficial results and effects as believed in by their proponents, and simply added the different spillway and diversion channels to send the waters to the Gulf after they were concentrated in the lower Mississippi.

You Members know to what purpose the lower Delta below New Orleans is dedicated to? I will tell you. It is the greatest fur-bearing district in the world. The fur business of that section is greater than that of United States and Canada. It is greater than that of Canada and Alaska. It is greater than that of Alaska and the United States. It is the home of the Hudson Bay seal. What is the Hudson Bay seal?

It is the great American muskrat. Should any one of the plans I have been denouncing—that is, the Jones plan, the Jadwin or Potter plans—be adopted, 3,000,000 acres of valuable farm land will, along General Jadwin's past ideas of levees, be junked. Three million acres more will be overrun by backwater and human life there will cease, where it should be the richest agricultural part of the United States. It will become the home of the great Hudson Bay seal industry of the United States, and men will fight and battle for trapper's licenses to ply their trade where formerly the hum of industry, both ordinary business and agriculture, was the song of the land. The sound of the steel trap as it springs its jaws on the great American Hudson seal will be heard, and the pitiful squeak will echo abroad as the licensed Hudson seal hunter brings down his club, opens his trap, and walks off with the only product where once was splendid agriculture and where the Arcadians dwelt in peace for hundreds of years before they were driven out a second time by act of Government.

An excuse has been given me by an honored citizen of New Orleans for the refusal of the Army engineers to consider the benefits to navigation by way of stabilization of flow, by reason of impounded waters from reservoir control, and by reason of benefits from power from such control, and by reason of benefits to agriculture by reason of that control, and which excuse is that owing to the urgency of the situation they did not feel called on to go any further than getting rid of the lower waters by reason of diversion channels, and did not feel required to go thoroughly into reservoir control with its intended benefits. But this excuse can not go. They did know that all of those four flood questions of flood control, navigation, power, and benefits to agriculture were firmly bound together by the Government and had been for years. That responsibility they can not evade. Any private employer that would send out a trusted agent to report on four great kindred questions and who would only get from such agent a report on one, and that the most expensive, and that the most damaging, and that losing sight of the three great by-products of his general enterprize would discharge such a faithless agent in a moment. Especially when he would discover that the agent had been receiving much greater compensation than he was paying from a sly and foxy competitor in the business.

Yet these things are all known to the administration. By the President. By the Secretary of War. And I have heard no word of rebuke. Either General Jadwin is running the administration in the relation referred to without reference to the welfare of the country or the administration is dictating to him. In any event he is a subaltern. He is an underling. The ultimate responsibility is not his. If George Washington had continued Benedict Arnold at West Point after his doings were known, of which the American people complained, no more fault could have been found with him than can justly be charged to those who keep on paying a salary to one who seeks to welcome the flood waters to the lower Mississippi and to toss them like worthless things out into the Gulf when they are a priceless heritage to the American people in so many different ways. Because anyone knows that if the people shall so far forget themselves as to expend anything like a billion dollars to perfect a plan such as is any of the pernicious plans referred to, to throw those waters out into the Gulf, it will be a long time before that same American people can be prevailed upon to spend several hundred million dollars for a comprehensive control of floods by a reservoir system, however beneficial it may be. There is only one plan of comprehensive flood control and that is by reservoirs in the areas where the floods originate and to that plan only, can I lend my consent. [Applause.]

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. I understand that there is a flood control bill reported to the House; does the gentleman know what has become of it?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. It has not come to the House yet, I think it is possibly waiting perfection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, for more than a hundred years efforts have been made to change the meeting date of Congress, abolish the short session, and change the inaugural date by a constitutional amendment.

During the past six years the so-called Norris amendment has appeared before committees of House and Senate in 14 different forms, all of which indicates the hazards of changing the Constitution.

If the last proposal submitted to the House was clothed in proper language and with proper safeguards, then we have had 13 opportunities to do it the wrong way since 1922.

The "lame duck" resolution that came before Congress a few days ago struck out the Norris amendment entirely and rewrote it in new language. Part of this language was then stricken from the resolution on the floor of the House and at another place new language was added. The vote was then taken during great confusion on a rehashed document that, so far as I have learned, had the full approval of no one. The usual comment was, "It can be straightened out in conference." The whole procedure raises many serious questions. It may be a great many years yet before the "lame duck" Congress is abolished by constitutional amendment.

I have, therefore, introduced H. R. 11991, which reads as follows:

[H. R. 11991, Seventieth Congress, first session]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 12, 1928.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 11991) to appoint a day for the annual meeting of the Congress required by the Constitution

Be it enacted, etc., That beginning with the year 1929 the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be at noon on the second week day after the 4th day of March. In the year 1933, and every fourth year thereafter, the Congress shall also assemble at noon on the second Monday in February.

If this bill were enacted into law, the "lame duck" Congress would be immediately abolished, and that is the desire of the people.

It accomplishes most of real value that is proposed by the constitutional amendment. My proposal could be enacted into law in an orderly way by a majority vote of both Houses and the approval of the President within 30 days, whereas a proposed amendment has failed for a century.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROMJUE. I realize that the gentleman from Washington is very much interested in correcting this matter in the way he thinks it ought to be corrected. I want to call his attention to the language in his bill. You can by legislation change the time of the beginning of the session, but you can not change the time of the beginning of the term except by constitutional amendment.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. My bill does not change the two-year term of any Member. It is drawn to conform to the provisions of the Constitution—but to make the meeting date as early as possible without a constitutional amendment—by putting it two days after the inauguration of the President, "the second week day" fixes dates so the convening of Congress and the inauguration of the President will not occur at the same hour and so that the convening of the Congress will never fall on Sunday.

Mr. ROMJUE. The date is the beginning of the session?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; it has to do with the sitting of Congress and not with the length of the term.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What committee has charge of your bill?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It has been referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What is the membership of that committee with reference to Democrats and Republicans?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I do not remember—this is not a political issue and I have given that no thought.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is not a political issue, but the gentleman realizes that the majority of the committee is Republican. If you do not get the legislation, the responsibility is bound to be due to the Republican organization.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman can go before the Judiciary Committee with me in behalf of the bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I am in favor of the legislation. I think it ought to be had. But I do not want the gentleman to convey the idea to the country that anyone is responsible except the present Republican organization of the House.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I can not accept that statement, since this has been a matter of controversy for a great many years and through many administrations. I think the thing which the country really desires is that Congress shall convene at the earliest reasonable date after the election of the new Congress, and that is what I have provided for in this short bill.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman's bill provide any limitation on the session?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It does not limit the length of session.

Mr. ROMJUE. There is no limitation?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No; not on the session of Congress.

My bill is so phrased as to convene Congress as soon after election as it can be done by law and at the same time avoid the assembling of Congress on the day the President is inaugurated or on a Sunday. The bill also provides for the assembling of Congress once in four years on a date two days prior to the date fixed by the Constitution for canvassing the electoral vote for President and Vice President. Thus the orderly procedure under the Constitution is in no way violated; the newly elected Congress would begin to function 4 months after its election instead of 13 months after election, as at present, and the lame-duck Congress would be abolished without delay.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA].

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the Members of the House I desire to read the following cablegram that I have just received from Porto Rico:

[Cablegram]

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 22, 1928.

Hon. FÉLIX CÓRDOVA DÁVILA,
Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

A concurrent resolution was adopted to-day by the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico to address the following cablegram to the President and the Congress of the United States through the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico in Washington [Hon. FÉLIX CÓRDOVA DÁVILA]: "In view of the letter addressed by President Calvin Coolidge through the Governor of Porto Rico, Hon. Horace M. Towner, to the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature, Antonio R. Barceló and José Tous Soto, the Senate and the House of Representatives of Porto Rico resolve to intrust the two latter exclusively with such reply as it is urgent and proper to make to said letter and to request the Congress of the United States to appoint a congressional committee to investigate the political, economical, and social conditions of Porto Rico. Said committee to hold public hearings where it shall hear all such citizens who request to be heard and who offer to present such data and documents as may be necessary to clarify the facts and to do the justice which is due to Porto Rico. It is further resolved to request Congress to extend the term established by law for the adjournment of the present legislative session for such time as may be necessary to receive the committee and aid it in its mission."

(Signed) ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ,
President of the Senate.
(Signed) JOSÉ TOUS SOTO, Speaker.

The authority to dispose of and make needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States is vested by the Constitution in Congress. The power granted to Congress by the Constitution carries with it duties and responsibilities that are impossible to escape. We already know the views of the administration and at last we know the views of the Bureau of Insular Affairs. But that is not enough; it is our desire that conditions in Porto Rico be thoroughly investigated by a committee of Congress composed of members conscious of their duties and really interested in the study of our problems and in working a solution to our present difficulties. We want open hearings so that the members of the committee will not be approached by anybody in secret conferences to state their own private views. Secret conferences are always dangerous, especially in Porto Rico, where there are men who do not dare to publicly state their views but always are ready to intrigue for their own selfish interests.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As the gentleman probably knows, a few days ago I introduced a bill providing for the election of a governor by the electors of Porto Rico. I also provided in that bill that the governor, in order to qualify, should be a native of Porto Rico. I know how eager the gentleman is to serve his Territory, and I know that he will help in getting the committee at least to give us a hearing. Both the Senate and the House of Representatives of Porto Rico passed resolutions approving my bill, and the speaker of the house and the president of the senate were kind enough to send me cablegrams to that effect. I am in communication with them, and I expect they will send a delegation here if we can get a hearing. It seems to me that the million people of Porto Rico are entitled to a hearing, and are entitled to an election of their own governor. Surely, that is the sentiment of the people of this country.

Mr. DAVILA. Certainly; we are entitled to it, but I am afraid that we will not get that hearing from the Committee on Insular Affairs in this session of Congress.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman has always been treated courteously by the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. DAVILA. That is true.

Mr. KNUTSON. The members of the committee have the highest regard for the gentleman. I do not think the gentleman's statement is warranted. The Committee on Insular Affairs is always willing to consider bills that have been referred to it, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] will have no difficulty, I am sure, in getting a hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the Commissioner from Porto Rico has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. While I do not assume to speak for the Committee on Insular Affairs—I see no other members of the committee on the floor at the present time—I assure the gentleman that the gentleman from New York will have a hearing whenever he asks for it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the delegation wants to come from Porto Rico; and the gentleman will help us get the hearing?

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Porto Rico is a member of the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And so is the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVILA. I am not making any criticism of the Committee on Insular Affairs, but it is my honest impression that at this time we are not going to obtain any favorable decision by the committee.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman realizes that the session is dragging along to an end.

Mr. DAVILA. I know that.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is more than half over, but I am sure that this bill that the gentleman from New York introduced will be expedited as much as possible, in view of the fact that Congress will probably adjourn in six or eight weeks.

Mr. DAVILA. I introduced a bill along the same lines at the beginning of the session, and no hearing has been had on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Porto Rico has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ACKERMAN].

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, in order that the membership of the Congress may have in convenient form for ready reference, there is herewith printed a statement compiled from official records showing what remarkable results for the benefit of the taxpayers have been obtained by the action of the Congress in connection with matters of appropriations. The record is a splendid one, and the fact that Congress has quite uniformly appropriated less than the Budget estimates called for is a fact not generally understood or appreciated by the public. In the period of years covered by the tabulation the House has been fortunate in having as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, whose experience, counsel, judgment, and courage have been of inestimable value in the conduct of the finances of the Nation.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I want to talk for a short period of time on the very important matter—the American merchant marine—which we are now considering before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which committee I am a member. I believe it is the general idea of the great majority in this country that we should have an adequate merchant marine, but the session is now dragging on to a close and I think it should be called to the attention of the Congress, and also to the attention of the country, that unless there is some coordination of opinion and some getting together by the various elements, all proclaiming a desire to have an adequate merchant marine, this session of Congress will adjourn without anything being done. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Senate, by a very large majority, passed the Jones bill, which, in effect, leaves the matter in the hands of the Shipping Board, providing that the Shipping Board shall not sell any of the vessels except by unanimous vote of the entire board, and providing that there shall be a replacement and reconditioning of the ships, and that there should be loans and other aids to the merchant marine, and that in the allocations of the operations of the ships the Shipping Board shall distribute them, as far as possible and without detriment to the service, among the various parts of the country.

Now, we find before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House that three distinguished leaders on the majority side of the House have introduced bills which are now being considered by that committee, to wit, the chairman of the committee, Mr. WHITE of Maine, and Mr. WOOD, of Indiana, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. WAINWRIGHT. These bills are now being considered by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The authors of these several bills all claim that they want a merchant marine, but the bills on the House side are diametrically opposed to the position of the Senate. There is an irreconcilable conflict, and unless there is some getting together and concert of minds the result will be that at the end of this Congress there will be no legislation on this most important subject.

Now, we find the President holding a position which is probably different from that of Mr. WOOD or that of Mr. WHITE of Maine or that of Mr. WAINWRIGHT or from the position of Senator JONES on the Senate side of the Capitol.

Now, what are we going to do? The House bills provide for aid. While they do not call the aid a subsidy, yet in effect it is a subsidy. Now, the very minute that you write into a bill anything that has even the look of a subsidy you are going to find that there will be a large membership of the House that will not support it. That was tried during the Harding administration, and the Lasker bill, while it passed the House here by a reasonable majority, was defeated in the Senate.

Now, there are a few fundamental things that we can all get together on. In the Jones bill the shipping act of 1920 is reaffirmed, particularly section 1, to this effect:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States; and it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to do whatever may be necessary to develop and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine, and, in so far as may not be inconsistent with the express provisions of this act, the United States Shipping Board shall, in the disposition of vessels and shipping property as hereinafter provided, in the making of rules and regulations, and in the administration of the shipping laws keep always in view this purpose and object as the primary end to be obtained.

The White bill, the Wood bill, and the Wainwright bill each have substantially the same provision, and I take it that Congress would be practically unanimous on this provision in the Jones bill.

Among the things that are controversial and which have brought up great agitation on the part of many people in this country is the proposition to discard and throw into the junk pile a large number of ships that are now owned by the Government. Well, the country might as well understand, and the House might as well understand that no such proposition as that can ever become a law, because the Senate has affirmed by a very large vote its opposition to any such measure, and it would be a crime to pass any such law when the people have been taxed to the amount of nearly $3,000,000,000 to build up a large fleet here. It would be a crime to junk those ships for the purpose of giving the shipyards and shipbuilding interests vessels to build. We might as well now forget that, and so far as any subsidy is concerned, I can only speak for myself and for such Members in this body as I have heard express themselves when they say that they certainly would not favor at this session of Congress any subsidy to the merchant marine.

But I do think that we can get together on the general purposes of the Jones Act as interpreted by section 1 of the act of 1920, and I think we can get together further on the provisions in the House bills, that there should be liberal contracts given to vessels flying the American flag to carry mails across the ocean. And I think we can get together on the further idea that there should be liberal loans made to those who want to engage in building ships at current rates of interest allowed by the Government. Those are things that we can get together on.

One of the troubles with the American merchant marine is the burden that the insurance interests of this country are imposing upon American shipping. The American companies writing marine insurance ought to be ashamed of themselves. It has been demonstrated beyond any question in the hearings before our committee that of these American companies that have been given certain privileges and have been relieved of the operations of the antitrust law by the Jones Shipping Act of 1920, 67 companies throughout the country have formed themselves into a syndicate for the purpose of writing insurance on American ships, and that they are giving preference to ships that fly foreign flags, and in some instances they are giving a preference of as high as 2 per cent on the insurance carried on cargoes and hulls. Now, we can not build up any merchant marine with such a situation as this confronting us. We can not build up any merchant marine and put the ships that fly our flag on the seas if the owners must pay such enormous rates of insurance. It was shown by the hearings that the men who classify these vessels and cargoes for the purpose of fixing insurance rates not only sat upon American boards but they sat on Lloyd's classification board, a board representing British interests.

We find as was brought out in the committee that discriminations are practiced against American ships and their cargoes.

For example, it was shown that the insurance premium on one of the American ships of a certain line was $13,375 in American companies, and but $10,000 in foreign companies, a discrimination of 35.7 per cent in premium, and that, therefore, the owner was virtually forced to insure his vessels abroad, while it was his keen desire to insure them in the United States.

Another owner, in a striking manner, declared that American marine insurance companies are holding up American steamship owners "at the point of a gun and with blackjacks," so to speak, and opposed as he was to the United States Government going into any business he felt that to save American ships from annihilation and being driven from the seas such a course seemed to be the only alternative.

In the closing days of the hearings on this intensely interesting subject, Acting Chairman Edward C. Plummer, of the United States Shipping Board, rose from a sick bed to offer his testimony, having been invited by the committee at my instance, and the statement is of such vital importance at this time that I place in the RECORD in full his statement, as follows:

STATEMENT OF COMMISSIONER PLUMMER

No legislation designed to restore American shipping to a competitive position in foreign trade will be effective until the extra burdens now imposed upon American ships by marine underwriters are reduced.

These complaints are not new. To my personal knowledge they have been continuous for at least 39 years. Thirty-nine years ago I became secretary of the Bath Board of Trade, of Bath, Me. At that time ships from my home city were still visiting all the great ports of the world, and the names of A. Sewall & Co., Houghton Bros., and others were well known to the entire shipping world. Bath then was a city of shipowners and ship captains, active and retired.

I recall and I remember it so distinctly, because it was the first meeting where I served as an officer of the board, that the principal subject of discussion was the discriminations practiced against American ships by marine underwriters, and a committee was suggested to see what could be done.

During the 21 years that preceded my coming to the Shipping Board I was attorney for the Atlantic Carriers' Association, an association composed of shipping men, and during all of that time the same complaints of alleged discrimination by the marine underwriters against American ships was a burning issue.

It must have been more than 15 years ago—it was some time before the war—that we began coming to Washington to endeavor to secure legislation which would remove this insurance handicap from our ships. Possibly our efforts helped to introduce in the first shipping act, of 12 years ago, reference to the upbuilding of marine underwriting in this country. Professor Huebner, an expert on the subject, was employed, and for years he worked on that subject.

At that time the president of our association had a vast amount of data which he had collected, both here and abroad; and I recall it, as his decided opinion, that there then was such an understanding between the American underwriters and the foreign underwriters that the foreign underwriters had agreed to allow the American underwriters to charge these extra rates against American ships, and that they, the foreigners, would reinsure to such an extent as was necessary, provided this excessive rate was kept on American ships, so that they could receive full rates for reinsuring; but that if Americans should adopt the rates of the foreigners, then the foreign companies would go into the American market and compete for American tonnage at whatever rates were necessary to get the business.

Professor Huebner went into the subject of marine insurance most exhaustively and rendered some very valuable reports. When the Senate, two years ago, directed the Shipping Board to prepare data and suggest legislation for the restoration of an American merchant marine it, of course, included insurance; and our research department has a volume of some 60 pages, prepared under the direction of Professor Huebner, from which compilation I want to read a few excerpts. Says this report:

"For years it (insurance) has been regarded by our competitors as a national commercial weapon to be used effectively in fostering national shipping and in acquiring and controlling important channels of foreign trade that furnish the freight—the lifeblood—upon which a merchant marine must live."

Again:

"Possession of sufficient national marine-insurance facilities is also often desirable for the proper safeguarding of commercial information. Marine insurers, by the very nature of their business, acquire vital trade information, exceedingly important with respect to a given trade, such as the names of consignors, consignees, and carriers, the financial arrangements, costs of production, leading contract terms, and methods of handling the business."

This is in line with the fact so concisely stated by Secretary Hoover in his New York address of four years ago, when he said:

"Nor have our merchants been without the experience of finding that the transport of our goods in foreign bottoms has been taken advantage of by our competitors to learn the details of our trade connections."

Realizing this—and now I am quoting again:

"The American Hull Marine Insurance Syndicate (containing 42 leading American companies and 23 foreign admitted offices as subscribers) was organized in 1920 at the request of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for the express purpose of taking care of the insurance needed for the general run of American hulls. The American companies subscribing to the syndicates have a combined capital of $131,900,000 and surplus of $278,537,726, or a total of surplus to policyholders of $410,437,726."

Now, quoting from the 1925 report of the superintendent of insurance for New York: "It is estimated that approximately 70 per cent of the ocean marine hull insurance in the United States is placed with foreign companies." "It has been estimated by those presumed to have knowledge of the subject that Lloyds, London, collect insurance premiums from New York State alone to the extent of $10,000,000 per year."

Continuing, this insurance summary says:

"During recent years foreign hull rates have been considerably lower than those quoted by American insurers. Brokers' correspondence with the Shipping Board in connection with the placing of insurance on vessels sold by the board shows that during the past two years foreign hull rates have ranged very generally from 10 to 20 per cent, and sometimes even more, under offers made by the American market. Letter after letter states that the insurance was offered to the American syndicate and declined. In his report for the year 1924 the chief underwriter of the syndicate explained that the syndicate allowed reductions where past experiences seemed to warrant, and that an endeavor was made 'to retain an interest in all business on which we could obtain terms that we felt would let us break even,' and they with surplus more than twice their capital."

How far these American insurers raised their rates over those of foreign companies is indicated by this telegram of August 20, 1925, received by the Shipping Board from the Export Steamship Line:

"In trying to place insurance according to contract and mortgage with American insurance companies, I find that I can insure in the open market at quite a saving in premiums—better than 30 per cent—and we request the board's permission to place insurance in the open market."

This report recommends, among other things: Greater development of protection and indemnity insurance among American underwriters. It says: "This type of coverage is very important to successful vessel operation. It is also important from the standpoint of volume of premiums collected; yet the great mass of this insurance goes to unauthorized foreign insurers. It is therefore suggested that the 'American Hull Marine Insurance Syndicate' might possibly be induced to extend their activities to this important branch of underwriting."

Continuing:

"Owing to insufficiently detailed separation of classes of business, it is impossible to state more than approximately the total volume of American marine and transportation insurance. Best's Insurance Report gives the net marine and inland premiums of the United States, less reinsurance and return premiums, as $68,055,327 for the year 1923. In the year ending December, 1924, the American hull market wrote in premiums about $2,500,000 on ocean-going hulls only. The best estimates are that from 25 per cent to 30 per cent only of the insurance on such American ocean-going hulls is written in the United States, the balance of 70 per cent to 75 per cent being placed in England."

And now I quote from the emphatic report which this Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee made on February 26, 1920. Says this committee: "The situation is an impossible one and must not be allowed to continue. Only 62 direct writing American companies participated in ocean marine insurance during 1918, while 6 additional companies confined their activities to inland and coastwise waters. Moreover, nearly one-fifth of the direct writing American companies were found to be foreign owned or very closely allied by having directors or leading stockholders resident abroad. Approximately two-thirds of the marine insurance written in the United States was found to be controlled by foreign underwriters.

"While the committee favors marine insurance conducted by private interests, it can not be unmindful of present woefully unsatisfactory conditions. The national welfare must be the first consideration. Should the contingency arise that American companies will fail or refuse to cooperate on a comprehensive scale, then your committee is decidedly of the opinion that the Government should remain in the marine insurance business even to the extent of greatly enlarging its operations." That was eight years ago. How much have these companies cooperated? I'll give you a sample:

Acting on the mandate of the merchant marine act that the Shipping Board do whatever it can to encourage the development of marine insurance in the United States, the board, whenever it has made loans, has incorporated in the contract a provision that a certain amount of insurance must be carried in American companies. That provision was contained in the contract covering the insurance of the California, a magnificent new ship that has just gone into service.

When she was ready to sail, Mr. Thomas, representing that line, came before the board's loan committee, of which I was a member, and pointed out that while they could get their insurance at 2 per cent from foreign companies, these American underwriters were charging them 2½ per cent. Accordingly they had placed the bulk of their insurance with the foreign companies, and they asked the board to consider the situation. The excessive charge so impressed the committee that it reported to the board that the California should be allowed to carry the insurance as it was placed until March 1, in order that the board might join with her owners in ascertaining if a lower rate could not be secured.

The next thing we knew these insurers, possibly having learned that the California was not so tightly tied up after all, cut their rate to 2¼ per cent, and cut it before the board had acted on the matter. But Mr. Franklin and Mr. Thomas have asked to come before the board again because they feel that there is no justification for such a large extra charge as one-quarter of 1 per cent amounts to on a $6,000,000 ship, and they will be given a hearing.

Now it happens that after we learned of this new price of 2¼ per cent I wrote a letter, which was approved by the board, advising the owners of the California, under the circumstances, to submit to this extra charge of one-quarter of 1 per cent; but in view of what has been stated before this committee, I am frank to say that when Mr. Franklin and Mr. Thomas next appear before our board they will find a very attentive listener in me. I am not an insurance expert; but I don't have to be one to know that if the 2¼ per cent they charged when it developed that the California was not sewed up is right, the 2½ per cent they tried to get in the first place was wrong. As no one will deny that P. A. S. Franklin is one of the world's ablest shipping men, "inexperience" can not be dragged into this case.

But the statement of Mr. Page that the way the insurance trio, of which his company is one, makes up its classifications, which are generally followed by the other marine insurance companies in this country, explains a whole lot—particularly why when anything happens to an American ship it is given great publicity; and when it happens to a foreign ship it is overlooked or practically smothered. To illustrate: I was on the Leviathan, and some other members of this very committee were also there, when two propeller blades let go.

She still had 14 perfectly good blades left and kept coming right along; but when we arrived we found sensational dispatches of the Leviathan being disabled in midocean had appeared in certain papers. And at about that same time one of the biggest foreign liners in the North Atlantic service nearly broke in two on one side and was so badly damaged that she had to be kept at Southampton for a million dollars of repairs because they didn't dare take her around to a shipyard; and yet I never saw a word about that in our metropolitan papers. So that on this newspaper basis of classification that ship is a perfect risk, and the Leviathan, because she was falsely reported to have been disabled in midocean, must rate as second class.

Take this South American case: The American-flag vessels in that trade owned by Moore & McCormack are charged from 5 to 12½ per cent, $100 more than is charged on similar cargoes shipped by Lamport & Holt, Prince, or the Houston Line (British lines); and 5 per cent more than is charged on cargoes shipped on similar Norwegian ships chartered and operated by Moore & McCormack. That is, the ships are similar; they are operated by the same firm; but the flags they fly are different; and the ones flying the American flag are the ones that have to pay.

You have heard a whole lot said about the necessity of charging extra insurance on the Export Line because of the inexperience of its operator; and here let me say that I have been looking at shipping men for 40 years, and I will put Mr. Herberman up against any of them when it comes to care, ability, and personal attention to the operating of ships. Now, there has come into my possession a somewhat time-stained paper, which possibly may have been suggested by that enterprising printer who Mr. Page says takes the findings of their triumvirate and distributes them to other insurers. It is headed:

"Recommendations of underwriters' committee in connection with cargo insurance on Shipping Board vessels which have been circulated to underwriters."

The second paragraph states:

"That the named vessels of the Export Steamship Corporation, operating out of North Atlantic ports to ports in the Near East, viz, Greek ports, Constantinople, Levant ports, Palestine, Syrian coast and North Africa east of Bizerta be granted as favorable a basis of classification for rate-making purposes as is granted to any of the following competing lines:

"Oriental Navigation Co., American-Mediterranean Levant Line, Prince Lines, Commercial Steamship Co., National Greek Line, Fabre Line, Ellerman Lines, Furness Withy & Co., Cunard Line."

The letter accompanying this, dated September 1, 1922, written by the Export Steamship Corporation to their shippers and consignees, says:

"Recommendations of the marine underwriters' committee in connection with cargo insurance on Shipping Board vessels under our operation, to the interested marine underwriters, are to the effect that the vessels operated by this corporation out of North Atlantic ports to ports in the Near East and Levant, viz, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, Asia Minor, Palestine, Syrian coast and north Africa, east of Bizerta, also the island of Malta, and minor points in this particular territory, be granted as favorable a rate of cargo insurance as is customarily given to the old established foreign lines in this trade."

I call particular attention to this because you heard this matter of experience stressed so much; yet when Mr. Herberman was beginning to operate these lines and was new in the business, they didn't raise the question of experience then—they gave his vessels the same rates as their competitors; and in my opinion they did exactly right. Furthermore, in charging him the rates they now are charging they are, in my opinion, unquestionably wrong.

It looks as if they felt so, for in the Roosevelt case it happens that on June 3, 1927, the operating department of our Merchant Fleet Corporation was informed that "at a meeting of the underwriters interested in the burlap and jute trade held that day it was decided to extend to the American-India and Atlantic-Australia Lines (operated by the Roosevelt Steamship Co.) the same basis of classification extended to its competitors provided certain conditions were complied with." Under date of September 15, 1927, our vice president in charge of operations, Mr. E. A. Kelly, wrote our manager of maintenance and repair at New York City, "in order to comply with the underwriters' requirements without conflicting with cargo arrangements, it is requested that you arrange to have the necessary additional bottles (fire extinguishers) installed on the following types of motor vessels now operated by the Roosevelt Steamship Co.:

	Bottles
William Penn	19
Oscar Daniel type of vessel	23
Los Angeles	4

You will notice there's no talk of experience here; all they seemed to want was more bottles.

It appears that our ships also complied with the requirements of the insurance underwriters as to conditions under which cargoes were to be discharged. So far as our operating department knows—and it is in charge of Mr. E. A. Kelly, a veteran steamship man whose competence nobody will undertake to challenge—we have done everything that has been suggested to us or that the trade requires; and yet that proposition made to us on June 3, 1927, has never been redeemed. There have been promises of consultations with us and of meetings to discuss this situation, but in spite of all the efforts we have made to bring this about that meeting at which we were to discuss the reasons why that understanding of June 3, 1927, had never become effective, has never been revealed. If the best explanation that can be offered for those high insurance charges is the one which I heard here, viz, the inexperience of the Roosevelt Steamship Co., I do not wonder that there has been no meeting with us; because that statement would not get very far with practical steamship men.

Since preparing this statement, I have received from our operating department the following letter, which I will read:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD
MERCHANT FLEET CORPORATION,
New York, N. Y., March 12, 1928.

VICE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL MANAGER FLEET CORPORATION,
Washington, D. C.

Attention vice president operations.

DEAR SIR: Referring further to our conversation of Saturday morning about the article in the morning Tribune, quoting Mr. C. R. Page in connection with insurance rates, and my letter to you of Saturday advising of the methods of handling cargo under the supervision of insurance or cargo surveyors:

On June 14 last you wrote me instructing that a meeting be arranged with the board of underwriters for the purpose of determining what their requirements would be incident to obtaining and maintaining the highest insurance classification for vessels in the burlap and jute trades. Upon receipt of your letter we addressed Mr. Benjamin Merklen, jr., of the board of underwriters, at once requesting a meeting for the following day. Mr. Merklen promptly replied, saying that it was impossible to arrange for a meeting on that day, which was Friday, June 17, but that he hoped to place the matter before the underwriters and have some definite word some time the following week.

Also, upon receipt of your instructions, we held a preliminary meeting in my office with a representative of the Roosevelt Steamship Co., one from our maintenance and repair division, and our traffic manager.

Not hearing from Mr. Merklen, I called him up and was informed that the members of the committee were out of town. A week or so later I called him again and was informed they were still out of town, and Mr. Merklen reiterated his former statement there was nothing he could do and we would have to wait until the members returned.

I wrote you on June 23 telling you the unsuccessful and unsatisfactory outcome of my attempts to get the representatives of the board of underwriters to attend a meeting.

The beginning of July we again wrote Mr. Merklen, telling him that we had heard nothing from him, and asked him if he was not in a position to tell us when we could expect to have a meeting. Mr. Merklen did not reply. Since that the traffic manager of the Roosevelt Steamship Co., on my instructions, has also endeavored to obtain some definite information from the board of underwriters as to their decision in regard to the insurance classification of our vessels, but all our efforts to date have been unsuccessful, and I believe we are quite justified in feeling there is no intention on the part of the board of underwriters to meet with us in an endeavor to agree on equipment and methods of handling cargoes so as to give our vessels the benefit of the highest insurance classification.

Our vessels are in every way equal to competing ones, and they are deserving of insurance rates no higher than the ships of competitors. Care in carrying and the supervision given to the handling of cargo is all that the cargo in competing ships receive, and there can be no reasons advanced as regards the ships operated by the Roosevelt Steamship Co. for adversely discriminatory rates.

Very truly yours,

W. E. GRIFFITH,
District Director.

And this man Griffith is a real ship captain, who has also been a marine superintendent, and knows from personal experience and observation what constitutes a ship and proper ship operation.

Possibly because the William Penn is operated by the Roosevelt Co. it was thought necessary to include her among ships that had had accidents, and you will recall how she was mentioned. They could not very well have picked a ship less adapted to what I judge was their purpose.

The William Penn is a motor ship of 13,258 dead-weight tons. She went into service on August 8, 1921, and has been in service continuously ever since. During that entire period—and I now quote from the report of the insurance department:

"The claims which we have paid on her account amount to slightly more than $7,000, which is less than one annual premium on this vessel. In fact, the insurance fund has received premiums on this vessel in excess of $60,000."

Do you wonder that these insurance companies have such corpulent surpluses?

And it happens that during her seven years of service, among her other achievements, she collected $17,500 in salvage, and it will be noticed that that one item of service on a single voyage amounted to about $11,000 more than all the claims that had accrued against the William Penn during her seven years of service.

You will notice that fact was not tacked on to the statement made to you of how she once struck something, and it happens that the striking referred to was only her propeller hitting a rock in those treacherous waters of the Philippine Archipelago; and when she struck she was being handled, not by the inexperienced Roosevelt Steamship Co. but by one of the most experienced steamship-operating companies in the world.

You didn't hear them mention the West Prospect, which for five years has been running to the Orient, and yet that Shipping Board vessel, which has never had the advantage of flying the British flag, has never had so much as a claim for insurance damage filed against her since she was built.

During the past four years the Shipping Board, operating something like 350 ships in all kinds of services, in some of the most perilous waters in the world, has only had six losses—only two more losses than the old experienced Clyde Line suffered in a single winter.

Now, I know that it isn't fair to cite these exceptional cases, so as to give this committee an impression that this is a sample of our operations, and I'm not attempting it. I am simply citing these cases, and I could add a lot to them, to let this committee understand that when it comes to picking out individual cases for self-serving purposes, more than one man can play at that game.

Every practical shipping man knows that marine casualties run in streaks. A concern will go along for years and years without serious difficulty, and then all of a sudden it seems as if the whole sky broke and everything went wrong. Take the case of the Clyde Line that I referred to. There's a veteran company that for a half century had been paying in its premiums and helping to build up the great surpluses which these marine companies have accumulated; and then, two years ago, in a single season, four vessels went, and I have no doubt, judging from what I have observed during these hearings, that this New York trio will probably forget the fact that this company in its insurance was only getting back a part of the premiums that it had paid during all these years, and that they will proceed to raise the rates on the ships of that company.

One will get an impression from what's been said here, that the operators go out on the ships and take care of them. So far as the operator is concerned, his contribution to the safety of a vessel is a minor factor. His principal duty is to provide a seaworthy vessel, and the first index of a seaworthy vessel is her classification. I understand it's been stated that these insurance men don't count the classification of vessels for much. I can't believe that that statement was intended to be made, because every practical man knows that the fundamental principle of safety of a vessel is her classification. The great classifying companies—Lloyds, the American Bureau of Shipping, and the French Bureau Veritas; they go over these ships—they classify them when they are built, and they go over them every four years, and at each period they put these vessels as nearly as possible in perfect condition, and the first thing that the insurance companies used to ask, when I was acquainted with their procedure before the war, was for the vessel's classification. Classifying is something in which the operator has no part. But the operator sees to it that competent men are put in charge of the ship.

Now, none of these American officers can take charge of a vessel until they are duly licensed by the department of the United States Government having that matter in charge; and the operator, just as the insurance agents used to do before the war, looks into the record of these officers—captains and engineers—to see if they are good, reliable men. When the operator has done that, and has sent his ship out in a seaworthy condition, he's done all that he can do. The ship is then in the hands of her officers and the perils of the sea.

I listened to the statements regarding the Roosevelt Line. Let me show you where that rule of this New York trio leads to. It happened at the time I became attorney to the Atlantic Carriers Association that William F. Palmer, a Massachusetts school teacher, whose knowledge of shipping was purely artificial, decided to go into the ship-operating business. He built a fleet of vessels. I don't recall that during his 12 years of operating he lost a single vessel. He was the man who, in the Marie Palmer, took the first cargo of gasoline across to France when all other shipping men were afraid to touch it, and he made a success. At the same time the old firm of J. S. Winslow & Co., of Portland, Me., who had been in the business for three-quarters of a century, whose experience and success no one could question, sent out the beautiful new ship Carnegie, which was built in my home city, in charge of one of the most experienced captains of the fleet, and she was lost on the southern shore of Long Island on her first voyage; and while the wreck was still there, this same firm sent out another new ship, the Miles M. Murray, also built in my home city, and also in charge of a veteran captain, and she was lost almost within sight of the Carnegie. Now, if this trio in New York had been operating under what I understand to be their present rules, because of lack of experience William F. Palmer's vessels would have been charged an overwhelming insurance premium and these ships of the veteran firm of J. S. Winslow & Co. would have been entitled to an exceptionally low rate of insurance. Practical men understand this, and that's why you find veteran shipping men, those who have learned the problem of ship operation by plowing those treacherous waters of the Orient or sailing the snow-blinded courses of the North Atlantic, are most charitable when it comes to discussing losses at sea. You will all recall how the Kearsarge went on Roncador Reef, 40 miles off her course, in charge of naval officers. Nobody will claim that the navigators of the United States Navy are not as competent as any in the world—but there's what happened. How did she get there? No one can tell, no more than anyone can tell how the Titanic, in charge of the most experienced master of that old line, was lost on her first voyage.

Something is to be allowed for experience, because men learn from experience to judge men and their capacities, but in my opinion it does not justify any such spread—any such spread—as is made between the Roosevelt Line and the British Harrison Line, or the Isthmian Line and the British Harrison Line.

You noticed how those accidents charged against the 92 ships which the Shipping Board pulled out of lay-up to take care of the grain and cotton shipments of this country during that period when foreign tonnage had practically deserted our shores, which ships saved the farmers and planters of this country millions and millions of dollars, were recited to this committee.

Every practical man knows the truth that Kipling voiced in "The Ship that Found Herself," how it takes time for a new ship, or a ship after years of lay-up, to get shaken down to her business—for her crew to learn their vessel. The Shipping Board put those 92 ships into as good condition as maritime skill could put them. The classification societies did their work, and they did it well; and I, for one, not only feel that the record made by those ships is one with which we well may be satisfied, but if the people of this country ever face such an emergency again, I, for one, shall advocate the putting into operation of another just such fleet; and any accidents that may occur then will not make any more impression on me than have the accidents to which reference has been made here. We had a duty to the public to perform, and we did it. It was an emergency service and liable to emergency contingencies.

Of course, I expected criticism from the foreign interests when we put those 92 American ships into service and prevented our American producers from being mulcted through excessive rates charged by foreigners; but I did not expect an echo to come from people here at home.

But, after all, it seems to me these insurance men have by their own admissions simplified the problem and shown how absolutely necessary is some such insurance legislation as that proposed in the bills now before this committee.

They have had eight years of unrestricted opportunity, free from all control and all supervision, to go ahead and put American vessels on a parity with foreign vessels, so far as the costs of marine insurance are concerned. They certainly have not done it. If I get the drift of what they have been saying, they admit they can not do it. Then here's the insurance problem in a nutshell.

It is admitted that we must have an American merchant marine. It is admitted that to have one we must have some Government assistance. We want that assistance rendered in the most effective way and at the least cost to the Government.

That's the reason we propose having the Government loan money for shipbuilding at 2½ per cent. That's the most economical contribution the Government could make. For if the ship has to pay bankers 6 per cent for its money, the contribution by the Government would be increased just that much. If we leave this extra charge for marine insurance on our ships, it's got to be paid for ultimately by the Government.

Let us assume for the purposes of this discussion that these insurance men are right in saying that the business can't be done for less than it's being done now. Then the Government might as well contribute through reinsurance in some other way, and there would result from the Government taking hold these two tremendous advantages: The millions which we now send abroad in premiums would be kept in this country, and the foreigners who now do the greater part of our reinsuring, as well as so much direct insuring, would be deprived of that intimate knowledge of what our merchants are doing abroad, which is their privilege to-day. And there's always the chance that these men will discover ways to cut down costs when they find there are other insurance companies, when they find they can get reinsurance without our competitors coming into the field. Of course, by birth, teaching, and lifelong experience I am radically opposed to having the Government do any business that a private citizen can do. But when a thing needs to be done and private parties have not done it and admit that they can't do it, then the Government should step in. Canada is teaching us something practical in the way of government activities every day. She found that the short hauls to New York were taking from her a vast amount of grain shipments during Montreal's closed season. Last September her railway commission authorized the Government railways to make the same rate on grain over the 1,187-mile haul to Halifax and St. John that is made on the 397-mile haul to New York. She knows that with plenty of base cargo, like grain, available in Halifax and St. John, vessels will bring to and take from those ports general cargo and thus develop those ports and support the transportation systems of that country. But because of the dreaded fogs which haunt those waters, as well as outlying reefs and rocks, insurance rates have been necessarily higher on cargoes to and from those Canadian ports than to and from United States ports—a handicap which the British preferential tariffs have not overcome. So now the Canadian Government is considering the formation of a Canadian Lloyd to insure vessels going to and from Canadian ports at the same rates as companies insure cargoes to and from American ports. They know, of course, how much more dangerous are voyages to those Canadian ports, how just is at least a portion of the extra charges made against those ports. But they also know how tremendous is the cumulative effect of even a small increase in marine insurance rates; and if private companies can't or won't find a way to solve it, the Canadian Government will.

If the extra charges on what cargoes are handled through Canada's three eastern ports are sufficient to move the Canadian Government to come to the rescue, can this country, where the volume of traffic affected is so tremendous and the extra charges run into millions, hesitate to show the same good business sense that Canada has shown in handling her rail rates and is preparing to show in handling her marine insurance rates?

In these hearings I repeatedly demanded to be informed by the representatives of insurance companies, or their general counsel, who was present, how it was that the United States Government, operating a department devoted to the self-insurance of Shipping Board ships, was able to maintain an average rate of 3 per cent in premiums and accumulate a substantial surplus from such premiums charged against its ships, while at an average rate of 5 per cent on the hulls of American ships American marine insurance companies showed only constant losses from such operations. That question was never answered, and there was much doubt as to whether the insurance representatives would furnish from their books the schedules of rates, gains, and losses on the hulls and cargoes of American and foreign vessels alike, insured by such American companies.

Most sinister rumors were constantly floating through the corridors and among the groups of men assembled at the hearings, of the power possessed by these American insurance companies and how it might be used to defeat the passage of any bill intended to give a living chance upon the seas for American ships. Some of these insurance companies were able to pay dividends upon millions of capital as high as 25 per cent per annum, as well as be able to accumulate surpluses several times greater than their capital stock.

The American steamship owners, on the other hand, were shown to be meeting annual losses from the operation of their ships, running into hundreds of thousands of dollars, with but a hope that the tide might turn before they became bankrupt. To their credit, these American steamship owners are undismayed, and are even planning to build new ships, so as to better meet foreign competition, and thus secure a fair share of the carrying of American cargoes to and from foreign countries.

For many, many years it has been known to all that powerful foreign lobbies exist in the United States, whose sole purpose it is to diffuse propaganda favorable to foreign and unfavorable to American ships, especially in the magnifying of every trivial accident or casualty happening to an American ship, in order to show the general unworthiness of them, while foreign ships, some of them crack trans-Atlantic liners, could almost break in two in mid-ocean, and limp to their docks, from which the insurance companies would not allow them to stir until they were thoroughly reconditioned, so fearful were they if taken to a shipyard and a drydock for such repairs that the vessels might collapse en route over a distance of only a few hundred miles.

A subcommittee of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee are trying faithfully to work out a bill that will conform to the views of the full committee, and I have every reason to believe that a bill will be reported to the House which we can all get behind and that we can then in conference with the Senate reach an agreement and can place the American flag on the seas over a merchant marine the equal of any in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks, and in that extension I would like to insert a statement of Mr. Plummer, of the Shipping Board, in reference to this insurance matter.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise again to make a few observations on what might be called "the submarine question." The S–4 has at last been raised after her long sleep in the mud and silt of the ocean for three long months. The remaining members of her crew, numbering eight, whose bodies had not been heretofore removed, are at last on the way to their families and their friends.

There were 40 men who perished in the S–4. I have expressed time and time again the hope that we might find some latent spark of humanity in our breasts which might be aroused to a flame of indignation and have the effect of spurring the bureaucrats in the Navy to some definite remedial action. Appeals to the heart have failed. I am going to make an appeal now to the pockets of the American people.

I have taken the pains to prepare a list of the accidents to American submarines since March 25, 1915, and will, without reading it now, put it in my remarks:

From this exhibit you will note that there were 17 accidents to American submarines from March 25, 1915, to date, and yet these gentlemen in the Navy congratulate themselves that they have not had more. In those accidents 129 American sailors perished. But what about human life? Evidently the death of six score or more of human beings does not count. Perhaps the financial loss involved might have a greater effect in spurring us on to some definite action. Well, I figured that out, too, aided by the experts from the Navy Department who appeared before the committee, and this is what I find: Those 17 accidents cost the American people $10,702,378.62, and that does not include six accidents about which they are unable to give us any report.

You ask: What is the significance of financial statements in connection with the loss of submarines? Just this, that with that $10,000,000 spent wisely and intelligently the Navy could have adopted devices which would have rescued the crews and salvaged the vessels, and it is my hope that if this side of the problem is sufficiently emphasized we may eventually compel the bureaucrats to adopt definite plans and devices for the saving of lives and the salvaging of submarines.

These experts from the Navy appeared before the committee and gave vent to the usual story of "how things can not be done." I hope the subcommittee were not hoodwinked by their arguments, which, to my mind, were quibbling, casuistical, and unreliable.

There is something about the bureaucrat that makes him essentially a conservative. I think the defect lies in his training and environment and the glamor, the honor, and dignity that go with military rank. Real men are not unbalanced by such things, but the little fellows are flattered and cajoled into the belief that because they are supposed to know they do know.

This criticism does not apply alone to the Navy. It is equally applicable to the bureaucrats in the Army. Why, gentlemen, if the world were dependent upon the originality and the initiative of Army and Navy bureaucrats we would still be fighting with flintlocks. There is not a single invention of any moment connected with the implements of war that has originated from the head of a bureaucrat. Of course, there are a few exceptions, but generally the experience of men of invention throughout our history confirms that statement.

INVENTORS' STRUGGLES WITH BUREAUCRACY

Take poor Doctor Bushnell, the man who made the first practical submarine. He was humiliated and ignored, so that he was compelled to take refuge in Europe. When after some years he returned to the United States he took up his home in Georgia under an assumed name and practiced his profession as a doctor.

Robert Fulton got no encouragement here. He had to go to France for recognition.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Knowing all of this, why does the gentleman insist upon deluding the country by holding out the false hope that any invention or device that is serviceable will be brought forth out of the department?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am not expecting any such happy result. But I am trying, if I can, with your aid, gentlemen, to goad them into the acceptance of devices that are recognized and adopted in most of the modern navies of the world.

Continuing, take the case of Ericsson, the inventor of the Monitor. As a matter of fact, when Ericsson brought his "cheese box on a raft" into Hampton Roads that vessel had not been accepted by the United States Navy. It was built by private capital in defiance of the opinions of the experts of the Navy, who told him that any fool knows that iron will sink. They did not believe it was possible to build an iron vessel with a turret on it which would be of any service, and his epoch-making invention had to earn its title to recognition in actual warfare at one of the most critical times in the Nation's history.

Sir Hiram Maxim who, notwithstanding the fact that he has the prefix "Sir" to his name, was an American, born in Maine, presented his device for a machine gun to our Government, but he was flouted and humiliated. He had to go to England to be recognized, and not only was his invention accepted but he was signally honored.

Take Hotchkiss, another machine-gun inventor. He was obliged to go to France to have his invention recognized.

Coming down to the present period, take the case of the Wright brothers. It is a fact that the first recognition the Wright brothers received and the first dollar they earned by reason of their invention was received by them in France. Our Smithsonian Institution takes the pains to deny the credit which was theirs, so that Orville Wright, although a good American, is forced to the recourse of sending the first plane that flew with a human being, at Kitty Hawk, to find an honorable place in a British museum.

This is not derogatory to Americans. It is no reflection upon our system of government nor upon our people, who are the most inventive in all the world, but it is a reflection upon the conservative, reactionary bureaucrats who never learn and who never will learn.

Take the submarines. They are an American invention, yet they received no encouragement here in the beginning. Simon Lake, in his book entitled "The Submarine in War and Peace," says:

> What is the reason for this lamentable state of affairs in respect to American military inventions? I believe that I can partially explain it. I believe it is because our Army and Navy officers are too busy with the routine of their profession to give the necessary time to a thorough investigation of devices other than those with which they are forced to become familiar by their training. I believe that there is not a single fundamental invention which has emanated from an Army or Navy officer during his service.

That is from page 138 of The Submarine in War and Peace, by Simon Lake. Likewise the following significant observation:

> The few inventions which have gained sufficient early recognition and have received governmental aid in their development have usually been forced on the Army or Navy by either political or financial interests (p. 139).

What is true of other devices in war is particularly true in the case of submarines.

John P. Holland, the inventor of the first practicable submarine, met with most humiliating and discouraging opposition in his dealings with the Navy from the very beginning. His first plans for a submarine were presented to the Navy in 1875. He went to Secretary Robeson with a letter from the governor of his State—Leon Abbott, of New Jersey. Secretary Robeson referred him to Commander Sampson, at that time in charge of the torpedo station at Newport, R. I., and later the admiral who destroyed Cervera's fleet. Sampson reported that the project was practically impossible, owing mainly—listen gentlemen—to the difficulty of finding in what direction to steer the boat under water and the attempt to do so would be an aggravated case of trying to find one's way in a fog.

Admiral Sampson was a good fighter, but very impatient when it came to bothering about new ideas. The good admiral did not seem to think it might be possible to steer the submarine by the compass.

Then when Simon Lake submitted his plans for the peculiar type of boat which he invented, and which has been largely adopted in foreign countries, he also ran up against this perverse and foolish hostility of so-called experts. His plans were referred to a naval board, but they were not adopted at the time, because the naval constructor of the board interposed the foolish objection that when the Lake boat was running on the bottom on wheels—you know the Lake boat was provided with wheels originally—"she might run off a precipice at the bottom and go down head first to so great a depth as to be crushed by the tremendous pressure of the water."

This was the offhand decision of a distinguished and experienced naval officer who did not even think of the elementary principle of physics involved in the submarine, namely, that the stability of the vessel itself, assisted by its hydroplanes, would prevent any such happening. In other words, the buoyancy of a submarine is such that there is hardly any weight to cause her to drop.

Now, in connection with hydroplanes it is interesting to note also that another great naval constructor, L. Y. Spear, enlightened the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, long before the chairmanship of our good friend, Mr. FRENCH, of Idaho. In 1902 he said:

As an expert I do not think he [Lake] would make his hydroplanes work. (Lake's book, p. 173.)

Notwithstanding this official opinion, the hydroplane has been generally adopted all over the world.

John P. Holland, the pioneer of submarine invention, died August 12, 1914, two weeks after the outbreak of the World War. He did not have the good fortune to live to see his invention applied and given the highest test; that is, the test of warfare. Six weeks after he died, however, one of his model of submarines sank three British battleships, the Aboukir, the Cressy, and the Hogue.

Holland's experience with the United States Navy experts humiliated him and soured the declining years of his life. Even after having obtained the award for building the first Navy submarine, known as the Plunger, he was hampered at every step in its construction by the interference of the "know-it-alls" in the Navy, who insisted upon modifications of the plans to such an extent that it turned out to be an absolute failure. For instance, they insisted upon the installation of steam engines developing 1,500 horsepower and failed to provide for the insulation of the fire boxes, with the result that no human being could stay inside the boat while the furnace was going. Recognizing the folly of these interferences, Holland induced the company backing him to build a second boat to be held in reserve when the trial of the Plunger proved to be a failure, as he suspected it would, and which it did. This boat, the Holland, was an unqualified success, for the reason, as Holland said:

It was built away from red tape and gold lace.

SOME NAVY MEN WHO HAD VISION

It is only fair to state that there were a few in the Navy who were not afflicted with bureaucratic inertia. Among them was Admiral A. T. Mahan, who was one of Holland's earliest supporters. Rear Admiral Jouett also had the vision to foresee the possibilities of the future. Admiral W. W. Kimball, now living here in Washington, and Admiral George H. Converse were also among the staunchest supporters of Holland.

Admiral Kimball particularly deserves mentioning, because he not only believed in the submarine, but he was willing to risk his life in one. In 1898, when we were at war with Spain and while he was in command of our torpedo flotilla off Cuba, he asked the Navy Department to purchase the Holland, even as she was, just off the stocks, before she had been accepted by the Navy Department. "Put me in command," he said and he would go into Santiago Harbor and torpedo the Spanish fleet. The bureaucrats shook their heads wisely and said: "Impossible."

Admiral Dewey was also a staunch advocate of the submarine, and his secretary, Lieut. H. J. Caldwell, was the first submarine captain in the United States Navy. Admiral Hitchborn was also another friend of the inventor and a man of vision.

Lieutenant Nixon, although himself the designer of the battleships Indiana and Massachusetts, was an earnest advocate of the submarine.

The support of these men was, of course, encouraging, but it was overwhelmed by the crushing antagonism of the reactionaries. Admiral Charles O'Neill, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, could see no virtue or promise in the new device. Admiral George Q. Melville was another expert of the reactionary class and wrote:

From the time that the Senate and House Naval Committees look with favor on these boats, there will be a decreased construction of battleships.

In other words, he feared the submarine as the rival of the battleship.

I do not know whether I ought to blame him for these views or not. Perhaps he saw what all thinking men do see in the future, and that is, that in the next war battleships are going to be tied up in a safe harbor and the contest will be between airplanes in the air and submarines under the sea.

THE SUBMARINE HAS COME TO STAY

I have no sympathy with the attitude of men who would abandon the submarine as an implement of war because of these unfortunate disasters. All that I am contending for is that they be given the same chance as surface vessels and that they be provided with obvious safety appliances for the rescue of the crew in case of danger and proper salvage facilities in case they sink. The submarine has come to stay, and while it is going to make war terrible it may have the effect of lessening the chances of war due to that very fact. But while wars exist, fomented by hate and greed, it is our duty to be prepared.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I agree with the gentleman as to the importance of the submarine, but it is interesting to know that, notwithstanding the criticism of naval officers, to-day we have the largest tonnage of submarines of any nation in the world.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is, of course, the best proof that we believe in it, but we should apply to it this fundamental principle—that if it is to be a useful instrumentality of war it must be fitted with all the safety appliances which are necessary to protect the lives of the crew.

SUBMARINES SHOULD BE FOOLPROOF AND NOT DEATH TRAPS

In other words, it should be foolproof and not a death trap. Industrial society takes great pains to protect the workingman at his bench and at his lathe, providing that saws and gears shall be protected so as to minimize their danger. Even admirals themselves, I dare say, use safety razors. They have comfortable quarters on battleships. Why should they not be disposed to adopt safety appliances for the benefit of men who risk their lives under the sea in submarines?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say to the gentleman that the bill provides $200,000 in addition for investigating and working out methods of that kind and the naval board has devoted much time and energy toward that end.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I congratulate the committee. I know it is in the bill and I appreciate it, but I want to prepare the minds of the Members of the House and the minds of the people of the country, so far as my words can reach them, for adverse reports by naval experts.

Mr. HARDY. They have had more than 3,000 propositions to make submarines safe, many of which have been investigated and found not of much use, and some have been tried out and found foolish. The officials of the Navy have gone forward very diligently in this direction, and, moreover, the Navy in itself is not expected to adopt every new thing suggested.

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; but they carry their skepticism to weakness. They have 3,000 suggestions, and I have received 300 from humane men and women from all over the country. A large number of the correspondents have written to me because they could not obtain recognition from the Navy Department.

Mr. HARDY. The committee has heard a great deal on the subject and has had a great many people before it on the question of safety devices. Your committee has not heard from the bureaucrats on this, but the committee brought before it men lower in rank. It was very interesting to hear their viewpoint when not surrounded by superior officers and when they could talk as they pleased.

Mr. GRIFFIN. All of that is in the hearings, which I hope Members will read.

Mr. HARDY. Here is what one boy said. He said—

we think the safety of the submarine lies in devices in the submarine which the men can use. We do not think so much of the plan of inaugurating buoys and pontoons around where the submarines go. That is like a football captain telling the boys before the game we have 11 ambulances here to take care of you, go in and do your best.

[Laughter.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Nevertheless the ambulances are there at the football game within reach and the boys know that if they are hurt they will not be buried alive. The boy my distinguished colleague from Colorado speaks of will not have very much solicitude about iron staples and pontoons accessible to salvage the vessel until the ominous moment when he happens to be trapped as poor Commander Jones was caught in his submarine. It is all very well for those brave boys to repeat parrotlike what their superiors have said, but it carries no conviction.

We have had 17 submarine accidents in a little over 12 years, an unfortunate record of incompetence and neglect not surpassed by any other country in the world.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, there is no excuse for the American Navy to have any loss of life or any disaster if by proper care and foresight it may be avoided, but I think the gentleman is in error when he contrasts so unfavorably the United States with foreign countries. We called upon the department to indicate to us the disasters over a period of some 8 or 10 years where loss of life had occurred, and on page 108 of the hearings the gentleman will find that since 1919 Great Britain has had six disasters with a loss of life of 200 in her submarine work, and Japan three, with a loss of life of 135, and the United States seven disasters, with a loss of life of 89, less than one-half the ratio of Great Britain upon a Navy that in submarines is not so large, and only about two-thirds of the loss of life in Japan, with comparison with a Navy that ranks as three to five with ours.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It would be well in that connection to also give the difference in the number of submarines in commission in the American Navy and in the two navies to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is right. That is the point.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to take up the time of the gentleman, but if he will just permit me to do so, I would direct his attention to pages 146 and 147 of the hearings, where he will find that the United States has 6 fleet submarines built, 50 submarines of the first line, and 65 submarines of the second line, as against for Great Britain 4 fleet submarines of the first line, 3 submarines of the second line, 1 cruiser submarine, 3 mine-laying submarines, 29 submarines of the first line, and 22 submarines of the second line. In other words, in numbers of submarines Great Britain is considerably below the United States, and so, with greater use of submarines and more men in the service, the loss of life through disasters has been one-half less in the fleet of the United States.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the gentleman for having taken the pains to make that comparison, because it brings me to a discussion of the very point I was about to discuss.

My colleague [Mr. OLIVER] hit the nail on the head when he interjected the suggestion that in this connection we ought to consider the submarines actually in commission. The figures my colleague [Mr. FRENCH] quotes from the tables on pages 146 and 147 of the hearings give the entire fleet, but if you will look at page 128 of the hearings you will find that out of a fleet of 122 we only have had in commission 79. The others, to the number of 43, are laid up and out of commission.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I think before we leave this point I should state for the RECORD at this particular place that the members of our subcommittee are much indebted to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] for many suggestions he has brought to our attention, and I am sure he has contributed to affirmative constructive programs by suggesting ways and means by which disasters may be avoided. However favorable the record of the United States Navy may be, we must not rest content until we shall have made submarine service as safe as possible to those who may be asked to engage in it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the gentleman. Now, as to his comparison with the losses in the British Navy. In the first place, the British vessels concerned were mostly of great size with large crews. The K–5, on January 20, 1921, had a crew of 57 men; the British submarine M–1, sunk in the British Channel in 1925, had a crew of 69 men. There were only 6 accidents in the British service, while there were 17 in ours in the period I mentioned. We do not build our submarines as big as they do theirs in England or else they are more heavily manned.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman wants to contradict me?

Mr. FRENCH. No. I am directing attention to another point. Since 1919, in contrast with the disasters that have occurred in the British Navy, two of our disasters have resulted in heavy toll of life. The other disasters have taken a less toll, or as follows: In one, a loss of life of 4; in another, a loss of life of 3; in another, a loss of life of 3; in another, 2; and in still another, of 4.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is where the gentleman was sleeping at the switch. That is where the Navy has pulled the wool over your eyes. They give seven as the number of accidents. There were more than seven.

Mr. FRENCH. I was speaking of disasters involving loss of life.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; and the others are worthy of consideration, too, because they might have involved loss of life.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman stated, as I understood him, that the British submarines were larger than ours. We have 50; all of them are of large tonnage except one. Some of ours exceed by 993 tons.

Mr. GRIFFIN. But they are not using them. We have six fleet submarines, first line, of approximately 1,500 tons; and only four of them are in commission, which you can confirm in the hearings at page 128. Of the "S" class of approximately 1,000 tons there are two of them under the sea. One was used to help salvage the S–4.

Mr. TABER. All of those are under commission.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That all appears in the hearings. I want to be as judicial and as fair-minded as I can in this statement that I have made to the House. I do not want to appear as a mere enthusiast. I want to tell you gentlemen the truth, and I hope you will all read the hearings of the committee. The subcommittee was very fair.

Mr. FRENCH. My colleague has called attention to the difference in tonnage of the smaller ships. On page 146 of the hearings the gentleman will find there are six fleet submarines of the United States of 9,618 tons, as against four of great Britain's with a tonnage of 6,670. In other words, they fall approximately into the same class as to tonnage, so the gentleman can not compare adversely in tonnage the two navies with the adverse feature against the United States.

Mr. GRIFFIN. As I have already said, only four of our first-line fleet submarines are in commission, so that the comparison with Great Britain's forces does hold good.

Mr. FRENCH. Then there is one other feature in that same connection. The steaming in miles for the submarines of the United States I would estimate to be not less than 25 per cent and maybe 35 per cent more than the steaming in miles for the submarines of Great Britain, of the same tonnage.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is information which the gentleman might very well give in a speech of his own if he wanted to take the responsibility of defending the Navy against the charges I make as to their tardiness in adopting modern safety devices. I have not fairly gotten into my subject as yet. I hope gentlemen will make their own arguments in their own time, because, after all, the comparisons which I made seem to be the only matters of contention.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, how many minutes have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I must hurry on, because I have barely gotten into my statement.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes. I shall use only a part of it and leave the rest with him. Permit me to say that members of this subcommittee have no defense whatever for any disaster that could have been avoided. We are not seeking to whitewash or cover over anything. All we want is to be helpful in obtaining truth.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I realize that.

Mr. FRENCH. As to the S–4, I do not know and you do not know. Now, may I say further, that when the gentleman was proposing a foundation for what he wanted the House to assume as a basis I felt the gentleman would welcome a statement as to tonnage, the mileage of steaming, the number of submarines, and other factors in connection with loss of life.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to say to the gentleman that I read those tables very carefully, but I did not derive the same conclusions from them that the gentleman does.

THE CAUSES OF SUBMARINE ACCIDENTS

Let me point out to you the causes of the various accidents in the United States submarine service. First of all, the F–4 was sunk 1½ miles off Honolulu. The cause was unknown. The F–1, December 17, 1917, by collision. That implies negligence and want of care. Take the accident which happened to the G–2 on July 30, 1919, due to an open hatch; to the H–1 March 12, 1920, off Point Rodondo, Calif., ran ashore. September 1, 1920, the S–5 sank off the Delaware capes in making a crash dive. September 26, 1921, the R–6 off San Pedro Harbor, Calif., a torpedo lock defect. December 7, 1921, the S–48, off Bridgeport, Conn., an open manhole. July 17, 1923, the S–38, off Anchorage Bay, Alaska, neglect to close valve. October 29, 1923, the O–5, collision with steamship Abangares off Limon Bay. Then the S–34, grounded in fog; the R–1, grounded; the S–19, grounded; the S–48, grounded; the S–51, collision with steamship City of Rome; the R–8, collision; the S–25, collision with the steamship Ortolan; and the S–4, collision with Coast Guard vessel Paulding. I submit that is not a pretty spectacle, and I do not think there is any defense for it.

CONTRADICTIONS IN THE HEARINGS

Now I want to go into the hearings to show some of the inconsistencies. I want to call your attention, gentlemen, in the first place, to the fact that the testimony of one of the naval officers shows that the probable lift necessary to raise the S–4 from the bottom of the ocean would be about 700 tons. It turns out that she was eventually lifted with six pontoons of 80 tons each; in other words, with a lift of 480 tons.

LIFTING EYES

I make the charge here without hesitation that if the Navy had fitted lifting eyes to these vessels in the Navy, such as Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg recommended after the salvaging of the F–51, and if they had had pontoons at New London instead of being scattered all over the country, at New York and at Norfolk, and that if they had had a salvage vessel within reach and were able to put divers down to the S–4 to attach the chains the vessel could have been lifted immediately.

Mr. HARDY. But if they had had 100 pontoons there they could not have worked for several days because of the weather.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is what you say, and that is what they say, but it is absolutely not so.

THE DOCTRINE OF INHERENT BUOYANCY

Mr. AYRES, of the subcommittee, asked a very pertinent question, and I want to lay emphasis on Admiral Hughes's answer:

Mr. AYRES. Can you count on anything, Admiral, in the way of salvaging boats or any other contrivance that you can have, or can think of, to save life?

Admiral HUGHES. No, sir; not that I know of.

Mr. AYRES. Any more than you could on pontoons?

Admiral HUGHES. The best thing I can think of is for the rescuing vessel to get men down to see if they can connect air lines and raise the ship from its own buoyancy; and that is about the only hope of saving life.

Now, mark the significance of this: He says that the only hope lies in the use of internal means to raise the vessel by its own buoyancy. What is the inference from that? Simply that the submarine has a certain degree of buoyancy, which is, of course, true. In case, however, of damage to the hull, whereby one compartment is flooded, the inherent buoyancy is diminished to the extent of the weight of the water admitted. In the case of the battery compartment of the S–4, which was the compartment damaged by the prow of the S. S. Paulding, the water admitted diminished the buoyancy of the vessel by approximately 300 tons. Obviously, if that decreased buoyancy can be neutralized either by blowing out the water or applying a direct lift from the outside, the vessel could be raised. In other words, if the facilities were at hand to apply a lift of 300 tons, then the S–4 could have been raised. This is confirmed by the reports of the divers which show that there was such a degree of buoyancy in the vessel in the unflooded compartments that she showed signs of having shifted her position.

One of the experts who has been quoted in the press states that when the vessel was struck the controls had been set to fill the ballast tanks and the vessel was on its descent. He is also quoted as saying that she did not sink because of the water admitted into the compartment through the fracture in her hull but sank only because her ballast tanks were full; and he goes on to state that if the crew in the control room could have remained at their posts they could have started the machinery to blow out the ballast tanks and that she would have floated to the surface, notwithstanding the loss of buoyancy due to the amount of water in the battery room.

Mr. HARDY. The storm would have prevented any diver from going down.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Never mind that. You are going ahead of the story. Consider now what was her condition when she sank. There was only one compartment filled with water. And what was the capacity of that compartment? She had 300 tons of water in her. Now, remember a submarine when she is submerged has what is called negative buoyancy; she may be raised or lowered with the mere touch of the hand. If you project into one compartment of a submarine 300 tons of water, you lessen the vessel's buoyancy by so much and have 300 tons more to lift. If they had had lifting eyes on that vessel and had had a suitable salvage vessel there to put into operation, she could have been lifted a part of the way, towed into shore, and the crew could have been rescued. I say this with due deliberation and with all the certainty of conviction that God has given me.

Now, on page 96 of the hearings Admiral Hughes when testifying before the committee said:

The S–4 lying on the bottom, as she is now, or as she was when we were working with her, has a weight of something like 760 tons.

But it turned out she had only 480 tons. That is all they had to lift.

SALVAGE SHIPS

Now, as to his views on foreign salvage ships, he states:

You have got to have them lift 700 or 800 tons.

This was in his argument against the use of salvage ships such as they have in the French and in the Italian Navy. He states you must have 700 or 800 tons lifting capacity and yet in every case where we have had to salvage submarines we have never had occasion to put into play the exertion of such a lift. The S–51 was raised with 8 pontoons of 80 tons capacity, or 640 tons. That was all the lift there. If we had had one of the German Vulcan type of catamaran salvage ships, she would have been perfectly capable of raising the S–51.

Yet Admiral Hughes persists in saying that as to salvage ships:

They would not do. I think the Germans built one or two; Brazil has one; Italy has one; and Spain has one. So far as I know, they have raised only a little submarine that weighed about 400 tons. You have got to have them lift 700 or 800 tons.

And yet if we had them, as the other navies have them, their capacity of 700 or 800 tons would have been ample, as it turned out, to have raised both the S–51 and the S–4.

AS TO PONTOONS

Mr. AYRES, a member of the committee, addressed this question:

Mr. AYRES. Admiral, do you not think it would be advisable to have a set of those at each of our naval bases, on both coasts?

Admiral HUGHES. I think we should have some on the Pacific Coast, but I do not say at every naval base; no, sir.

Mr. HARDY. You do not count much on these pontoons for the saving of life, do you?

Thus encouraged, Admiral Hughes said, "No, sir." Further on he continues:

Mr. OLIVER. Right there, Admiral, it seems to me that your answer to Mr. Hardy's question should be qualified; because, of course, if later you should put on a safety device and find that it is practical, and that your divers could make the connection, then if you had your pontoons near by, you might raise her pretty quickly. So, of course, they could be considered in connection with the saving of life.

Admiral HUGHES. I said before that they are a possibility, but not a probability.

Mr. OLIVER. I thought there should be a qualification.

Admiral HUGHES. Incidentally I might say that those pontoons have not been used yet. I think they will probably put them down, if weather conditions permit, in the next few days. They got there within 24 or 36 hours after the thing happened. They were all on the spot; but they have not been used yet.

Here, again, the admiral goes off from the true state of facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has consumed one hour. The gentleman from Idaho has yielded the gentleman an additional five minutes, which can not be yielded to him without the consent of the committee.

Mr. AYRES. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas also yields the gentleman five minutes. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding 10 minutes beyond the hour?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now, as to getting the pontoons there, four pontoons were sent to Provincetown, a storm came up, one of them broke away and was lost, and in the testimony of one of the Navy men there appears an item of $16,000 for building another pontoon to take its place. This was 48 hours after the accident. The remaining pontoons sent up from Norfolk did not get there until Wednesday night; in other words, the 21st. This was 96 hours afterwards.

Mr. HARDY. If they had got there the day after the disaster, they could not have been used.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is true, but it shows the way these men quibble and do not know the facts when they are testifying before committees of this House.

Mr. HARDY. But the impression the gentleman gives is that with due diligence we could have saved the lives of the men in the S–4, when the facts are that the storm was such that with all the devices the gentleman has mentioned the divers could not have gotten down there to use them.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am trying to present a complete case, and I hope the gentleman will not take up my time.

THE SALVAGE AIR LINE

Now, note what the admiral says about the only device that is practicable, in his mind, which is to get an air connection to the sunken vessel, to pump air into her and drive out the water and have her rise of her own buoyancy. He sticks persistently to the thought that this is the only way of accomplishing a remedy of conditions, and yet he has never been able to do that very thing.

On the S–4 they were able to get a connection with the salvage air line and the moment they started to pump the air in the water came into the torpedo room, and the men there begged them to stop pumping because the water was coming in from the battery room.

Now, it seems that they do learn, but it takes years to get a new idea into their heads. The salvage air line as installed in all the S-type of vessels is a conduit stretching from the compartments with an inlet near the conning tower, and you are thus obliged to make a connection there and pump the air into the conduit and through that by branches into the different compartments. They persisted in that for years, although the experts have warned them that it was dangerous. The proper way to install air inlets is to make a separate air inlet for each compartment. Now, they are going to do that very thing in the new type of vessels. But they are only doing it after two submarines have gone to the bottom, with a casualty list of 73.

TELEPHONE SIGNAL MARKERS

Now, for the telephone signal marker, look at the hearings on page 990. Admiral Beuret says—we installed them and removed them and we could put them back again should the operating personnel desire it, but they apparently do not consider them necessary.

Mr. OLIVER asked him if it could not be so attached as not to interfere with the operation in peace times, and Admiral Bueret said that would be entirely practical. That was something apparently they had never thought of. They took them out entirely.

Lieutenant Jones was asked how long was it after the sinking of the S–4 before it was discovered, and he said it was discovered within a few hours; they knew exactly from the navigational data of the Coast Guard destroyer where it was located.

Those were valuable hours! Mr. AYRES asked the admiral:

Would this telephone buoy that you spoke of have enabled you to locate her earlier than she was located had it been attached to the submarine—

And Admiral Beuret said—

As a matter of fact the approximate location of the S–4 was known practically at once from the navigational data of the service ship.

Mr. AYRES said he appreciated that fact, and that is the reason for it, but under other conditions would this telephone buoy have enabled them to locate the submarine a few hours earlier than would otherwise have been the case, and Admiral Beuret said—that would depend on the damage she received. It might have destroyed the buoy.

You see how ready they are to jump at some excuse for not doing the thing they ought to have done. They are not bound to having one marker—they can have three. They do not count much in weight and they do not take up much space.

Now, on page 1009 of the hearings, Lieutenant Jones further testified:

My own experience with that marker buoy in making a 200-foot dive to test it proved the uselessness of it, as it was released some time prior to our resting on the bottom at 200 feet and was never found.

Now, mark the reasoning he gives for not having found it. He says:

When we made our test dive of 200 feet, the releasing of that buoy from a 200-foot depth was required as a test. We attempted to release it from inside the boat. We operated a mechanism to release it from inside the boat. When we came to the surface the tug that was observing and standing by had not seen any buoy, and asked us why we had not released the marker buoy.

Then Mr. OLIVER asked him—

Might not that have been due to some defect in that particular buoy or its attachment to the ship?

And Lieutenant Commander Jones said:

Nobody knows. The cable was gone. There was a defect somewhere in the system, and knowing the danger of a buoy being released when it was not warranted, we all asked to have it taken off, and they were taken off.

Apparently, no one in the Navy thought it incumbent upon him to make inquiry why the marker was so improperly attached that it disappeared—and even the cable with it! This is a fine example of contentment being a virtue, but a mighty poor example of Navy efficiency.

BREATHING DEVICES

Now, there is another device in use in foreign navies—in the German, Swedish, Dutch, and Spanish. It is a breathing device which enables the crew, in case the vessel is damaged at the bottom, to go into a chamber or an airlock, put this breathing device on, which consists of an oxygen supply and a clamp over the nose, and float to the surface. Lieutenant Momsen says they are not practical, and yet they have been tried and adopted in other navies.

ELECTRIC ARC TORCH

This is a device that enables a diver to cut through all kinds of metals under water. It was tested away back in 1923 at the submarine base at New London, found satisfactory, and Lieutenant Commander Jeans, United States Navy, the laboratory officer, wrote the following letter to the International Submarine Co. (Inc.) advising them that—

Recommendation was made that an outfit be installed on the U. S. S. Falcon for a service test.

NAVY YARD, NEW YORK,
LABORATORY SECTION,
December 13, 1923.

INTERNATIONAL SUBMARINE CO. (INC.),
17 Battery Place, New York City, N. Y.

Subject: Electric cutting—under water.

GENTLEMEN: With reference to the test conducted at the submarine base, New London, on electric cutting under water, you are advised that the report has this day been forwarded to the Bureau of Construction and Repair via Bureau of Engineering.

Recommendation was made that an outfit be installed on the U. S. S. Falcon for a service test.

It is suggested that you write to the Bureau of Construction and Repair relative to the test at New London and the prospective test on the Falcon.

Very truly yours,

H. S. JEANS,
Lieutenant Commander, United States Navy, Laboratory Officer.

Well, was it installed? Not much! The Navy bureaucrats do not move as fast as that. It took them just five years to make up their minds to install a device that every private wrecking company in the world had in the meantime adopted. I now submit the telegram from the commander of the salvage operations on the S–4, dated January 15, 1928, which brought about its final adoption:

UNITED STATES NAVAL COMMUNICATION SERVICE,
Boston, Mass., January 15, 1928.

COMMANDANT NAVY YARD,
New York.

Action commandant navy yard, Boston, information navy yard, New York, Bu. C. and R. 0015.

There are available in this force only gas torches for underwater cutting. This equipment requires careful regulations, expert handling, and can be used only for ferrous metals, besides using large quantities of gas. Delay in regulating and operating gas torches required valuable hours of good diving weather, and salvage force may possibly be confronted with necessity of cutting nonferrous metals underwater. Recommend all preliminary steps be taken preparatory to rental or procurement of electric arc underwater cutting equipments, including motor generators. Government not to be obligated to any expense until equipment actually called for by this force. Prospective bidder International Submarine Co., 95 Liberty Street, New York. All work with this equipment to be performed by naval personnel of this force 1727.

COMMANDER SALVAGE OPERATIONS "S-4."

SALVAGE FACILITIES

As far back as 1913, Congress did think that there was something in salvage facilities, for in the naval appropriation act of that year there was an appropriation of $300,000 to provide for a study of the subject.

The appropriation was never used, and in the naval appropriation act of 1915 it was made available for building more submarines.

Now there is an appropriation of $200,000 in the present bill for the same purpose. I hope it does not meet the same fate as the last.

SUBMARINE SALVAGE VESSELS

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman made the statement at the beginning of his very humanitarian discussion, to the effect that all other nations have these safety devices that would rescue the lives and save us from the disasters that we have had—practically that statement. Does the gentleman know of any ship or any device now known to mankind which in the storm that followed the sinking of the S-4 could possibly have been there and worked in that storm and saved any lives?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. This Simon Lake from whose book I have been quoting, a distinguished inventor, built years ago a salvaging submarine called the Protector.

Mr. HARDY. Where is it in use now?

Mr. GRIFFIN. This protector submarine had a compartment in the forward part of the vessel, a diving chamber, from which divers could work. It is perfectly feasible to lower that submarine and have the divers emerge and go to the submarine that is in danger and work upon her. Mr. Lake's company offered this salvage submarine to our department on January 14. He offered to put up a bond that he would have that salvage submarine in shape so that it would be possible to work four divers from it inside of 30 days from the date the contract was signed.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the gentleman's question bears on this, I yield; otherwise I would prefer to continue.

CASUALTIES IN INDUSTRY

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. It bears on this. Of course, we all regret very much the disaster in the operation of submarines, but I ask the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] how does the loss of life in the operation of submarines compare with the loss of life in the operation of surface ships, trains, and the industries of our country, if he has any information on that subject.

These catastrophies are followed always by the regret of the whole Nation, and the sympathy of the people goes out to the families of the deceased, but in the operation of any great civilization and its ramifications, there are many tragic happenings, and no one is censurable or blamable, because it is inconceivable that anyone would consciously or otherwise contribute to such a holocaust as the mournful affair to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is so feelingly referring. Are not these terrible accidents, profoundly shocking as they are and heartbreakingly regrettable, almost inevitable in a rapidly growing civilization with its many accompanying inventions, which, in accordance with the law of compensation, bear good as well as bitter fruits? Are not these disasters, in other words, the fearful price we pay, and which has always been paid for the dizzy heights to which we have ascended?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I compliment the gentleman upon his alacrity in coming to the rescue of the bureaucrats and justifying their negligence by digging out of his mind the plausible but ancient doctrine that progress must take its toll of human life.

Of course, every intelligent being knows that in the development of new implements, both in war as in industry, certain mishaps happen, but it is wrong to say that they are inevitable. Vision and foresight might very well prevent the greater number of them; but the fact is that humanitarian devices for the protection of life and limb rarely owe their installation to foresight. Usually they come from hindsight; that is, after a long train of obviously avoidable disasters. And that is just the point I am driving at. I am willing to forgive the Navy its want of foresight; that is, in failing in advance to see the dangerous points in submarine navigation. What I complain of is that they do not care to take advantage of hindsight; they will not even profit by past experience, and they persistently and dogmatically insist on ignoring the advances made elsewhere in the world in life-saving and salvage devices.

Mr. HARDY. It is stated that 20,000 people were killed last year at grade crossings.

Mr. GRIFFIN. We have gotten far astray in discussion. There is no doubt that if men are callous enough to refuse to be influenced by tragedies of this kind they will justify themselves for all sorts of accidents due to human frailty. But there is this thing to be accentuated, and that is that men are becoming more civilized; they are trying to do better. The laws provide for the improvement of industrial conditions and the introduction of safeguards to protect the lives of human beings; and that is all I am making my plea for here.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I just want to compliment the gentleman for the lucidity of his statement.

Mr. GRIFFIN. In that case I am bound to yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. He has mentioned the disasters that follow the introduction of mechanics into those activities. If the gentleman had not mentioned it, perhaps nobody would have noticed it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Strange, is it not?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not want to intrude upon the time of the gentleman from New York, but I will say, if I may do so, in response to the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR] that of course our committee could not undertake such a voluminous inquiry as the suggestion of the gentleman would indicate he would like to have us undertake. It is true, however, that whenever we develop machinery and mechanism with which to assist human labor, we have disasters vastly greater in number than we would like to have. For example, last night's Washington Star related that 92 children in Washington had been killed during the last five years as the result of automobile accidents. I do not know that it is inevitable. It ought not to be inevitable. I do not believe it is. But certainly it is true that disasters fall among people who exercise great care and ingenuity and thought in connection with the operation of machines of all kinds.

SIGNAL BOMBS

Mr. GRIFFIN. The signal bombs which were ordered by the Secretary of the Navy in 1914 are being installed on our submarines now. Admiral Beuret says:

> Considerable difficulty was encountered in developing a satisfactory pyrotechnic for the signal cartridges, but about January 1, 1928, a supply of such cartridges was shipped to the home yards of all submarines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not ask for any further time. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and place therein certain tables and letters and matters to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore given some attention on the floor to attacks that have been for some time made upon the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and to certain organizations, avowedly formed and maintained in the interest of the Indians, but which are destructive rather than constructive in their policies and efforts. There has just come to my attention a statement issued by the secretary of the Indian Rights Association, which has its headquarters in Philadelphia. I do not know how old an organization that is. I do know that the first contact I had with any organization in behalf of the interests of the Indians was with this organization when I was a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, a number of years ago. It has an honorable record of useful service.

The regrettable thing is that so much misinformation concerning the Indians appears in church and other magazines and papers and a good many people are led to believe that the Government treats the Indians unjustly, whereas they have in the main been treated with great generosity. The statement I have, and that has just come to my attention, is the reply by this Indian Rights Association to certain specific charges published in the Christian Century in December, and under the leave granted I shall insert that statement, and to those who desire some exact information about certain controversial points on our Indian affairs, I think it might be of interest. As Franklin has said, "To sift truth from rubbish, I do what I can."

INDIAN RIGHTS ASSOCIATION, 995 DREXEL BUILDING,
Philadelphia, Pa., February 28, 1928.

The attached editorial from the Christian Century of December 15, 1927, was submitted to me for comment on the accuracy of the 11 specific allegations contained therein. This I have done in the memorandum that follows the article, without attempting to include other information bearing on the general question.

M. K. SNIFFEN,
Secretary Indian Rights Association.

SPECIFIC CHARGES VERSUS GENERAL DENIALS

When one considers how difficult it is for the ordinary citizen to get a clear idea of what the United States Government is doing with and to the quarter of a million Indians who are its wards, one may be grateful that we have no mandates in remote regions of the earth where control would be, if possible, still more arbitrary and the facts still more difficult to ascertain. Some months ago the Churchman published an article by Rev. Irwin St. John Tucker containing a severe indictment of the Indian Bureau based upon the report of the Indian Commissioner himself and the sworn testimony presented to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs last February. Commissioner Burke is said to have been present when this evidence was given to the committee, but he did not reply at the time. Subsequently, the commissioner published a reply to the charges in the Churchman, and still later the Episcopal missionary bishops in the Indian areas issued a manifesto denying the charges and defending the bureau and the commissioner. To a reader of this considerable body of material, the most significant fact is that, omitting rhetoric, many of the charges are specific while the denials are general. We find nowhere any denial of such statements as these: (1) "The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has under his absolute control $90,000,000 in money and securities and $1,650,000,000 of Indian property, according to his own report, which he administers, and as guardian he reports to no court, can be questioned or disciplined by no court." (2) "The Indian makes a will—Commissioner Burke can amend or nullify it." (3) "On reaching the age of 6 every Indian boy and girl is subject to be taken from his or her family—if necessary by force—and sent 200 or 1,000 miles away to an Indian boarding school." (4) "These schools are overcrowded exactly 38.5 per cent above their utmost possible capacity, as stated by the bureau." (5) "There is every possible condition to facilitate the rapid spread of disease, particularly tuberculosis." (6) "The death rate among Indians has increased 48 per cent in four years." (7) "The Indian tuberculosis death rate is six times the white death rate." (8) "The Indian Bureau in 1926 actually requested Congress to reduce the appropriation for health and medical work among the Indians." (9) "The Indian property is being dissipated at the rate of 4 per cent each year through actions exclusively by the official guardian and not by the Indians." (10) "The Navajo Nation was informed that the bureau recommended and Congress had voted to appropriate $100,000 from their tribal fund to build a tourist bridge, which is 40 miles away from the nearest habitation." (11) "Simultaneously the Christian Pimas, who are dying at five times the white death rate, are taxed $100,000 for a tourist bridge, with decorative electric lights, to connect Phoenix with Tucson." These specific statements are not to be answered by sweeping assertions that they are "malicious, libelous, and defamatory."

(NOTE.—Figures in parenthesis indicate that specific comment is made thereon in the following memoranda.)

"1. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has under his absolute control $90,000,000 in money and securities and $1,650,000,000 of Indian property, according to his own report, which he administers and as guardian he reports to no court, can be questioned or disciplined by no court."

Comment: The commissioner does not have absolute control of Indian money and property. His acts are all subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior, and any acts not authorized by law or in abuse of discretion are reviewable by the United States courts.

"(2) The Indian makes a will. Commissioner Burke can amend or nullify it."

Comment: Commissioner Burke can neither amend, nullify, or approve an Indian will. The Secretary of the Interior, however, in his discretion may approve or disapprove a will made by an Indian, but he can not amend it.

Further, the Secretary's decision is not final. If any heir is not satisfied with the settlement of the estate in question, he can appeal to the Secretary for a rehearing through counsel; or if it can be shown the Secretary's decision was arbitrary or capricious appeal can be taken to the United States courts. (Lane v. Mickadiet, 241 U. S. 201; Butterworth v. Hoe, 112 U. S. 50; Garfield v. Coldsby, 221 U. S. 249; Harnage v. Martin, 242 U. S. 386; Houston v. St. Louis, 249 U. S. 479.)

The department has a staff of "examiners of inheritance," trained in the law, who act as a probate court in the settlement of Indian estates affected by wills or intestate law. Open hearings are held and full opportunity given to any claiming a right to a share of the estate. Every case is set forth by the examiner in a report with his recommendations. This is examined in the law division of the Indian Bureau, and if errors are discovered the report is returned to the examiner for reconsideration. If not, the case is submitted to the Secretary of the Interior where other legally trained examiners check up the statement of facts before final action is taken.

Since the present law went into effect (1910) the heirs have been determined in about 60,000 cases, and probably not more than 3 per cent of that number have been disputed.

The average probate cost to the Indians was $25, which is about one-fourth of the fees charged in the courts of the respective States.

We know what happened in Oklahoma, for instance, when Indian estates are probated in the county courts.

"(3) On reaching the age of 6 every Indian boy and girl is subject to be taken from his or her family—if necessary by force—and sent 200 to 1,000 miles away to an Indian boarding school."

Comment: The act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stat. 876), forbids taking of Indian children into another State for school purposes without the written permission of the parents. Incidentally, the Secretary of the Interior is directed by the act of February 28, 1920 (41 Stat. L. 408–410), to compel every Indian child between the ages of 6 and 16 to attend school.

In a few sections there was formerly some objection on the part of parents to sending their children to school; but now, in most localities, they are eager to have their children attend school. In the Navajo country the parents usually prefer to have their children remain on the reservation, in the boarding schools, rather than be sent to the distant nonreservation schools. As to the latter, however, it is interesting to note that the requests of the Indians to be admitted to them far exceed the capacity of the schools.

Moreover, many of the parents wish their children to attend the boarding schools, because they are comfortably clothed, well fed, and are better protected at night from inclement weather that is encountered in most of the camps or villages, which make it difficult to keep warm. In fact, they have more of a chance to survive at school than if they remain at the camps.

"(4) These schools are overcrowded exactly 38.5 per cent above their utmost capacity, as stated by the bureau."

Comment: Commissioner Burke's report for 1927 gives the total capacity of these schools as 33,195 and the average attendance 27,618.

"(5) There is every possible condition to facilitate the rapid spread of disease" in these schools.

Comment: This statement might be applied to many of the most unfavorable Indian homes, but certainly not to the Federal schools, which are under constant medical supervision.

"(6) The death rate among Indians has increased 48 per cent in four years."

Comment: Instead of an increase of 48 per cent in four years, ending with 1924, the increase for the five-year period—1921 to 1925—is only 4.9 per cent.

"(7) The Indian tuberculosis death rate is six times the white death rate."

Comment: The death rate from tuberculosis among the Indians is undoubtedly greater than among the whites; but there are no reliable statistics available to make such a positive statement on the subject. One contributing cause to this high death rate from tuberculosis is the fact that in some localities the Indians are slow to adopt modern methods for coping with the disease. The department, however, has been conducting various campaigns to bring the Indian to a realization of doing something to help himself in the fight against tuberculosis.

It is likewise a fact that while the Indian death rate from tuberculosis is higher than among the whites, the Indian is largely immune to certain diseases that are so often fatal to whites.

"(8) The Indian Bureau in 1926 actually requested Congress to reduce the appropriation for health and medical work among the Indians."

Comment: This is wholly misleading. The appropriation for the year 1926 was $700,000, as compared with $500,000 for the fiscal year 1925. The bureau's estimate for 1927 was for $760,000. The Bureau of the Budget cut this to $675,000, but Congress appropriated for that year $756,000, or $4,000 less than the bureau's estimate.

Incidentally the appropriation bill for the year beginning July 1, 1928, contains an item of $1,547,500 for "conservation of health."

"(9) The Indian property is being dissipated at the rate of 4 per cent each year through actions exclusively by the official guardian and not by the Indians."

Comment: The estimated value of the Indian property for the year ending June 30, 1926, was $1,693,844,806. For the following year—1927—it was $1,716,815,123, or an increase of $22,970,317.

As for dissipating the property, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs can not expend a dollar without authority of law.

Where there are tribal funds it is the Indians—aided and abetted by storekeepers and other interested parties—who clamor for a per capita distribution. These Indians send delegations to Washington for the avowed purpose of securing the passage of a bill directing the commissioner to make such a per capita distribution from tribal funds on deposit in the United States Treasury.

As an illustration: Two years ago (69th Cong. 1926) a bill was introduced at the request of an Indian delegation to appropriate $5,000,000 for per capita payment to Klamath Indians.

"(10) The Navajo Nation was informed that the bureau recommended and Congress had voted to appropriate $100,000 from their tribal fund to build a tourist bridge which is 40 miles away from the nearest habitation."

Comment: This statement is true as to Congress making an appropriation of $100,000 toward the cost of the bridge at Lees Ferry on western Navajo Reservation, but it is only one-third the cost of the structure. Then, to make it of any value, over $300,000 must be spent to build a road to reach the bridge from Cameron, a distance of 40 or 50 miles. It is true that the bridge will be of practically no immediate benefit to these Indians. Congress, however, has adopted the policy in granting appropriations for any improvement on an Indian reservation to make it a reimbursable charge against the tribe concerned. No immediate collection is contemplated, but the item remains as a charge in case minerals of value are later developed on such reservations, and when funds were being received from such a source the money would be paid back in the United States Treasury.

Because of the political influence behind the measure, the matter would have gone through Congress, regardless of the attitude of the Indian Bureau. In my judgment the bureau made a mistake in not opposing the scheme.

"(11) Simultaneously the Christian Pimas, who are dying at five times the white death rate, are taxed $100,000 for a tourist bridge, with decorative electric lights, to connect Phoenix with Tucson."

Comment: The Pimas are charged $100,000 for the bridge, but they understood the proposition and favored it. The bridge, however, is a superstructure on the wing diversion dam—part of the San Carlos irrigation project—to carry the flood waters to their farming lands. It is likewise of great benefit to them, for the Gila River at times rises very quickly, and when in flood crossing is only possible over a bridge. The Pimas have not made any complaint against this item, but regard it as a great blessing.

Concerning the allegation that they are dying "at five times the white death rate," it should be noted that the tribal rolls on this reservation had not been corrected for about 10 years, and when an allotting agent visited the agency to make a check-up, he found that there were being carried on it the names of approximately 1,000 Indians who had died in that period. Of course, the names were removed from the census record; and if a comparison was made the following year on the basis of the uncorrected roll the percentage of decrease would appear to be abnormally high and wholly misleading if no explanation was made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 180

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. WOODBRIDGE N. FERRIS, late a Senator from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL].

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, under general debate on the Navy appropriation bill it occurs to me that it would be in order and very appropriate to discuss flood control, because control of floods on navigable interstate streams in the United States constitutes a very material and important part of national defense. Splendid interstate or national highways are likewise a very important element in national defense. When highways are under water or when they have been washed out and ruined by floods they are of little use in assembling armies or war materials. Everyday navigable interstate streams, such as the Mississippi River, are likewise of great value as a national defense in the transportation of armies, war materials, and so forth. Hence it behooves the Nation to take and manifest a great interest in so controlling the floods of the tributary streams to navigable waters in such a way and to such an extent that the navigable waterways will be always available as a national defense. Then, in addition to the national defense use of interstate navigable streams, there is the everyday interstate commerce use. For these two paramount reasons, to wit, the national defense and general interstate commerce use, the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries by the Federal Government is a tantamount national problem.

But the paramount question is: How shall the problem of controlling the floods on the Mississippi River be successfully and equitably solved? The proposal to do all the work on the lower Mississippi as a means of controlling the damaging floods and maintaining the river in a condition susceptible of everyday use in commerce is one method or plan. This treatment of the subject of flood control reminds us of the plan of healing a disease by treating its effect rather than the method of removing the cause. Another plan is to do such emergency work on the lower Mississippi as will temporarily protect the inhabitants and their property being near the stream and, in addition thereto, ascertain what per cent the various Mississippi tributaries contribute to the floods on the Mississippi. And thereafter, by appropriate legislation in the way of Federal aid, to contribute to the control of floods upon the major streams tributary to the Mississippi. This plan would necessitate, of course, the States and benefit districts contributing the balance of the expense in controlling floods on State or interstate streams by a system of terracing, of reservoir building, of straightening, widening, and cleaning out the channels of the streams. The plan for the State to use for raising its share of the money to be determined by its legislature. This plan would increase the value of the taxable property of the State by reclaiming the flood-damaged land and increasing the value thereof by insuring against the disastrous effects of uncontrolled floods. Such a plan would contemplate, of course, some regulation by the Government of the use of reservoirs, but when finally put in operation would be the most logical, the most effective, and the most equitable plan or system of flood control. The Government would be bearing and contributing its proper share of the cost for national defense purposes and for the civil industry of interstate commerce, and the States and benefited districts would be properly chargeable for the special and local benefits derived from the flood control. Thus the whole problem could be reasonably, successfully, and equitably solved to the benefit of all the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the committee will rise in just a moment. May I make this statement? SENATE

SATURDAY, March 24, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"How beautiful it is to be alive!
To wake each morn as if the Maker's grace
Did us afresh from nothingness derive,
That we might sing, 'How happy is our case!
How beautiful it is to be alive!'

"To read in God's great book, until we feel
Love for the love that gave it; then to kneel
Close unto Him whose truth our souls will shrive,
While every moment's joy doth more reveal
'How beautiful it is to be alive.'

"Not to forget when pain and grief draw nigh,
Into the ocean of time past to dive
For memories of God's mercies, or to try
To bear all sweetly, hoping still to cry
'How beautiful it is to be alive!'

"Thus ever toward man's height of nobleness
Strive still some new progression to contrive;
Till, just as any other friend's, we press
Death's hand; and, having died, feel none the less
'How beautiful it is to be alive.'"

Let us pray. O merciful God and Heavenly Father, who hast taught us in Thy holy word that Thou dost not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men, look with pity, we humbly beseech Thee, upon the sorrows of the family and loved ones of Thy faithful servant whom Thou hast called unto Thyself. Gently Thou didst press the tired lids to rest, for so Thou givest Thy beloved sleep. Vouchsafe to him, O Lord, light and rest, peace and refreshment, joy and consolation in the paradise of God; and may the benediction of his noble character rest upon us all, that having served Thee with constancy on earth we may be joined hereafter with Thy blessed saints in glory everlasting. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have had sent to me a copy of a letter written by Mr. A. W. Lafferty, 510 Park Avenue, New York, addressed to the firm of G. Siegel & Co., Stuttgart, Germany. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and I call it to the attention of the Senate for the reason that the letter is filled with falsehoods.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator think the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is the appropriate place to publish a letter filled with falsehoods?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that so many parties are interested in the alien property bill and what it contains that I thought it advisable to let them know that Mr. Lafferty is writing to his clients making a number of statements in his letters which are absolutely untrue. I do this because other clients have no doubt received letters from him to the same effect, and I want them to understand the truth of the matter. That is the reason why I give it such publicity.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator intend to explain the statements in the letter?

Mr. SMOOT. I will just read one statement to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not asking the Senator to do it out of the order he has planned; but it occurred to me that if the statements in the letter are untrue they should be contradicted by a statement of the Senator from Utah in detail.

Mr. SMOOT. Lafferty starts his letter by saying:

You may have heard that I generated some warmth at Washington in regard to the alien property bill. I did; and if I had not done so the capital release would have been only 60 per cent this year instead of 80 per cent. I let the big American damage-award holders, as well as the big German shipping companies and banks, understand that unless my clients got at least an 80 per cent release this year I would point out to the Senate Finance Committee some of the weaknesses of the larger claimants on both sides. As a result, hearings were ordered before the Senate Finance Committee and the large American claimants then agreed to an 80 per cent release of capital at this session to all German property owners.

The fact of the matter is that the House of Representatives agreed upon 80 per cent and there was no question in the minds of the members of the Finance Committee to change it in the least. Mr. Lafferty had nothing whatever to do with it. That is the only one of the statements that I shall read, but as the letter goes into the RECORD in its entirety I shall make only the statement that other statements are just as false as the one to which I have called attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Utah is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

(Abscrift. A. W. Lafferty, 510 Park Avenue)

NEW YORK, February 11, 1928.

Per S. S. Karlsruhe, sailing February 12, 1928.

Firm of G. SIEGEL & Co.,
Stuttgart, Germany.

DEAR SIRS: You may have heard that I generated some warmth at Washington in regard to the alien property bill. I did; and if I had not done so the capital release would have only been 60 per cent this year, instead of 80 per cent. I let the big American damage award holders, as well as the big German shipping companies and banks, understand that unless my clients got at least an 80 per cent release this year I would point out to the Senate Finance Committee some of the weaknesses of the larger claimants on both sides. As a result, hearings were ordered before the Senate Finance Committee, and the large American claimants then agreed to an 80 per cent release of capital at this session to all German property owners.

You will remember very well the propaganda in all the German papers last summer that a 60 per cent release was the very best to be hoped for at this session of Congress. And that very program would have gone through, except for the aggressive fight I put up at Washington this winter for the upstanding German property claimants who were not standing on thin ice and who had nothing to fear.

As a result I have benefited all German property claimants to the extent of 20 per cent of their custodianized capital—that is, my fight will give them 20 per cent more of their capital than they otherwise would have received at this session of Congress.

I simply told Congress the plain, unvarnished truth, just as I told the people of Germany "Die Ungeschminkte Wahrheit" in my pamphlet sent out from the Hotel Kaiserhof last October.

I have used strategy which I believed would win before the Senate Finance Committee, and it did win.

My clients will very soon receive checks for 80 per cent of all their custodianized cash, and they will receive 80 per cent of all their custodianized Liberty bonds or other property. They will receive 5 per cent interest-bearing certificates for the 20 per cent of their capital withheld, and they will receive also certificates for the interest earned by their custodianized cash prior to March 4, 1923, a period of five years, and that interest item will amount to another 20 per cent of the capital, and the last-named item would have been lost entirely this year to the German property claimants if it had not been for the hearings which I alone demanded and procured before the Senate Finance Committee. I believe the last-named certificates will also bear interest at 5 per cent, due to my special argument and citation of a Supreme Court decision before the Senate Finance Committee at the official hearings, which you probably have read.

With best wishes, very sincerely yours,

(Signed) A. W. LAFFERTY.

LEASES GRANTED BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with law, a list of leases granted by the Secretary of War under authority of the act of July 28, 1892, during the calendar year 1927, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE, STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, March 15, 1928.

Whereas the Government of the United States has no institution in the State of New York for the confinement of persons charged with or convicted of crime against the Government; and

Whereas the Federal Government is dependent upon State, county, and city institutions for the temporary detention of its offenders, resulting at times in overcrowding such institutions and in violation of State laws relative to classification of prisoners; and

Whereas the State commission of correction reports that the authorities of the United States have been notified that after April 1, 1928, no more Federal prisoners will be received in the institutions under the jurisdiction of the department of correction of the city of New York, which action promises to result in congested conditions in county penitentiaries and county jails of the State; and

Whereas there is urgent need for a Federal institution in this State to care for United States prisoners: Be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Legislature of the State of New York memorialize Congress to provide a suitable institution in this State in which to confine those charged with or convicted of crimes against the Government of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of Congress from the State of New York at Washington.

LOANS TO NICARAGUA

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have a short statement dealing with loans by this Government to Nicaragua, which I ask the clerk to read from the desk. I further ask that it may be treated as a petition and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations after it shall have been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The statement was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

In November, 1921, a loan of $175,000 was made by this Government to Nicaragua, payable $5,000 per month. They defaulted in November 26, leaving $8,500 interest and about $25,000 due on the transaction.

In spite of this over $400,000 more was loaned by our Government, of which Nicaragua has paid $141,221.15, leaving a balance due and payable of about $300,000.

In reporting these transactions the Secretary of the Treasury reports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, page 579, in a table usually supposed to cover only interallied debts—and using the act of July 9, 1918, as his authority—under "Obligations received for surplus supplies sold on credit," an item under Nicaragua of $166,604.14, with a payment of $139,721.15, leaving a balance due of $26,882.99. In his annual report next year, page 628, under the same headings, the Secretary of the Treasury reports as obligations received for surplus supplies sold on credit to Nicaragua, $431,849.14, with payments amounting to $141,221.15, leaving a balance of $299,127 due the United States Government. In this last amount I understand there is involved a transaction between the War Department and Nicaragua, whereby we let them have munitions of war valued at $266,059 for 53 notes of $5,000 each, maturing monthly, beginning January 31, 1929, with 6 per cent interest as maturity. Chamarro, minister, signed the notes.

BOULDER DAM

Mr. PITTMAN I present a letter that I have written to the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of the House, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOULDER DAM

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, March 22, 1928.

Hon. ADDISON T. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: I have been informed that your committee, or a subcommittee thereof, are considering amendments to be proposed by your committee on the floor of the House to H. R. 5773, commonly known as the Boulder Dam bill. This is substantially the same bill that was reported out of the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation on March 20, being S. 728.

The Senate committee, upon my motion, amended S. 728 by inserting on page 6 of said bill, lines 5 to 12, inclusive, the following:

"If during the period of amortization the Secretary of the Interior shall receive revenues in excess of the amount necessary to meet the periodical payments to the United States as provided in the contract or contracts executed under this act, then immediately after the settlement of such periodical payments, he shall pay to the State of Arizona 18¾ per cent of such excess revenues and to the State of Nevada 18¾ per cent of such excess revenues."

No such amendment, I am advised, was considered by your committee prior to reporting out H. R. 5773.

The Senate committee discussed this amendment off and on for several weeks before adopting it. In the circumstances I know that you will not consider it presumptuous upon my part to state the reasons that urged the Senate committee to adopt such amendment.

The Senate bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall enter into contracts for hydroelectric energy under such terms and conditions as will reimburse the United States Government for the money expended, together with interest thereon, for the building of the Boulder Dam and appurtenant works within 50 years. It is understood, of course, that these contracts will call for annual or other periodical payments to the United States Government.

The price at which the power will be sold is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. The annual or periodical revenues received may be only sufficient to meet the contractual payments due the Government, or they may be in excess of such an amount. If they are not in excess of such an amount, then the States of Arizona and Nevada will receive nothing from such revenues. If they are in excess of such amounts necessary to meet the contractual payments due the Government, then the Government takes its 62½ per cent of such excess revenues and the balance of 37½ per cent is divided equally between the States of Arizona and Nevada.

Some who are unfamiliar with the facts surrounding the initiation of this legislation and the conditions on the Colorado River have naturally inquired why should the States of Arizona and Nevada be granted any revenues. At the time that Congress had under consideration the oil leasing bill and it was proposed to pay to the State where the oil lands were leased by the Government 37½ per cent of the royalties received by the Government the question was asked, Why should the States receive any royalty paid to the Government? Congress in such act did pass such provision and did allow the State 37½ per cent of the royalties received, and answered such questions as follows:

Congress had the legal right to adopt a conservation policy. The Government owned the public lands in which the oil was located. Congress had authority to withdraw such lands from entry and acquisition by private owners. Congress did this. While it was a good policy, it injured the State in which the policy was put in force and effect because it withdrew forever from the possibility of taxation such lands and mineral resources. The State's ablity to maintain through taxation the State government was thereby depreciated. States can not exist unless there is property to tax. Whilst there was no legal obligation on the part of Congress to grant any royalties to the States, they considered it just and right that it should be done to compensate to some extent the State for the loss of potential taxable property.

This amendment is based upon the same theory, and Congress is asked to extend to the States the same policy under this act. This entire legislation is based upon an agreement between the seven Colorado River Basin States, known as the seven-State compact, and sometimes called the Santa Fe compact.

Why does Congress in this legislation ratify the seven-State compact? Under the water laws of the Western States, one who appropriates and puts to use water obtains a vested right. If citizens of one State first appropriate the waters of a stream and citizens of another State higher up the stream later use such water and depreciate or interfere with the prior users in the lower State, the lower State can enjoin the upper State and through it the users of the upper State from the use of such water.

The upper States of the Colorado River Basin will not be able to use the waters of the Colorado River for a number of years, and they realize that if they aid in the building of dams in the lower basin and in the use of the waters by Arizona, California, and Nevada that such States might get a vested right in and to all of the waters of the Colorado River and thereby forever prevent any further use of such waters by the upper States. So it was agreed between the seven States that half of the waters of the river should forever be reserved to the upper States and half of the waters of the river turned down for use of the three lower States.

It was understood, of course, that there would be an agreement between the three lower States as to the division of benefits of the waters to the three lower States, because if such division were not had then the State of California, which is in a more advantageous position to use the water at present, might appropriate all of the water allocated to the three lower States. In other words, the object of the agreement was to protect each of the seven States in the opportunity for equal benefits from the use of the waters of the Colorado River.

There are three main benefits to be derived from the use of water, namely, for potable purposes, reclamation, and the generation of electrical energy. Nevada's lands, being higher than the reservoir, can use very little of the water, but she could use as much of the water for the generation of electrical energy as either Arizona or California.

Now, there is no question that the Colorado River is a navigable stream at the point where the dam is to be built. If it were not a navigable stream, or not subject to being made navigable, then the Government, under this act, would have no authority to build the dam. If it is a navigable stream, then the State of Nevada owns the bed of the stream to the middle of the river.

There is no doubt that under the law Nevada has sovereignty over the water within her borders. This ownership of the land and this sovereignty over the water would entitle Nevada against any other State or municipality or corporation or individual to charge for the use of its lands for dam purposes or the use of its water for power purposes. If anybody else except the Federal Government built the dam and the appurtenant works, such dam and appurtenant works would be subject to taxation by the State, and such taxes would be far more than it is reasonable to suppose that the State can ever receive out of the revenues provided in the amendment.

We do not contend that the State has the power to tax the property of the Federal Government or the hydroelectric energy generated any more than it would have the right to tax the Government's oil lands or the royalty received by the Government from the leasing of oil lands. But the United States Government, for the benefit of the whole Nation and in the carrying out of the national policy, deprives the State of Nevada of a most valuable dam site. In fact, the only dam site of its character on the lower Colorado River. It does this for the purpose of carrying out its constitutional authority to regulate commerce and improve navigation, and no State can complain against this. It does not undertake this enterprise for the purpose of engaging in business and making a profit. As a matter of fact, on the Mississippi River it will do all of a similar kind of work for flood control at the Government's own expense without reimbursement, and properly so.

All that the proposed amendment provides is that a portion of the excess revenues over and above the amount necessary to repay the Government for its investment, principal and interest, shall be paid to Arizona and Nevada in the nature of a compensation in lieu of the loss of taxable property through the acts of the United States Government just the same as is done under the oil leasing law and the forest reserve law.

We believe that Congress, when it understands the situation—for there have been many misrepresentations of our position—will establish a policy that will do justice in this particular case.

Sincerely,

KEY PITTMAN.

FEDERAL LAND BANK OF COLUMBIA, S. C.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, on the 24th of February last I submitted a resolution asking for the examination of the Federal Land Bank of Columbia, S. C. Since that time some other gentlemen have been taking an interest in the matter. I notice that Representative STEVENSON, of South Carolina, a member of the House Banking and Currency Committee, has called for certain records which he desires to be placed before his subcommittee. I wish to call this matter to the attention of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency and ask that it report, one way or the other, the resolution which I submitted.

I desire to put into the RECORD some proofs to support the irregularities, to say the least of it, if not corruption, that are now going on and have been going on in that bank for the past couple of years. I understand that the man who is at the head of that bank was formerly assistant superintendent of the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., and if he has had any banking experience I have so far not been able to ascertain the fact.

I desire to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a telegram from the Union County Agricultural Credit Association, an editorial from the Beaufort (S. C.) Gazette, eight letters, including a letter from Gertrude Matthews Shelby; also an article entitled "Is amortized farm loan a panacea or a plague," by James B. Morman.

In this connection I call attention to the resolution to investigate this bank which was introduced on February 24 last; to the editorial on Federal intermediate credit bank investigation from Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD February 28, 1928, page 3607; to letters in reference to Columbia (S. C.) Federal Land and Intermediate Credit Bank investigation, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD March 8, 1928, pages 4340–4341; to the pamphlet published by Xeno W. Putnam, of Harmonsburg, Pa., in reference to foreclosures by Federal land banks, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD March 12, 1928, pages 4554–4557; and to the resolution for investigation of Federal Farm Loan Bureau and subsidiaries, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD March 13, 1928, page 4606.

Mr. President, in order to show that we mean what we say in this matter, and that it is not child's play, I wish to read a list of the witnesses whom I propose to offer if this investigation shall be authorized. They are as follows:

Hon. Ernest Cochran, United States judge for the eastern district of South Carolina; Hon. J. D. E. Meyer, United States district attorney for the eastern district of South Carolina; Hon. Mendel L. Smith, former circuit judge and former speaker of the House of Representatives of South Carolina; Hon. Edgar A. Brown, former speaker of the House of Representatives of South Carolina; Hon. David Mittle, alderman of the city of Beaufort, S. C.; Hon. F. W. Scheper, banker, of Beaufort; Hon. Burt Rodgers, clerk of the court of Beaufort, S. C.; Hon. Robert A. Cooper, recently of the Federal Farm Loan Board, who, I understand, was turned off by Mr. Mellon because he would not do his dirty work; the Hon. J. Swinton Whaley, member of the South Carolina House of Representatives; Mr. Sam Edwards, of Latta, S. C., a farmer; Mr. R. J. Nesmith, farmer, of Nesmith, S. C.; Mr. J. O. Devlin, farmer; Hon. William J. Thomas, of Beaufort, S. C., who is an attorney at law and was receiver for the defunct Beaufort bank; and the Hon. Neils Christensen, former State senator from Beaufort, S. C.

Also, Mr. President, I ask to have referred to the committee, without printing in the RECORD, as it is too long for that, a report to the American Farm Bureau Federation by Gertrude Mathews Shelby, which accompanied the letter from her which I have asked to have printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report referred to will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I hope that the committee will not think that the investigation which I have suggested is for the purpose of doing anybody any injustice. It is not. The resolution I have introduced does not propose a political investigation, but an investigation of the banking conditions down there, brought about by the crooked dealings of certain bankers, two of whom have been recently convicted in the Federal court at a cost to the Federal Government of $100,000—$60,000 before the trial was reached and $40,000 during the trial.

If conditions are crooked, as is alleged by people from whom I am receiving letters, I think the Government owes it to the people of South Calorina to go to work and straighten out that crookedness and turn these men out if they are crooked. Moreover, I think the Government owes it to itself, if it has men in that bank down there who are corrupting it, who are doing an injustice to the farmers, to take action to end that condition. I think that all the members of this body, regardless of their political affiliations, should want to clean out the bank and restore confidence in it, so that the people of the State may not only be benefited thereby but that the people of the Nation may know that we are not interested in having slumber in a committee room a resolution which is designed to do something that is for the best interests of the whole country. If there is no corruption, let the people know it and let them have their confidence restored in this bank and its management. On the other hand, if there is corruption, let us see to it that the men who are responsible for it are turned out and put the bank back into the position where it belongs, so that it may not only be a clean, clear-cut institution, but that it may serve the people as it was intended under the original enactment to serve them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLEASE. With pleasure.

Mr. FLETCHER. If all the matters of which the Senator complains have been under investigation by the courts down there, and certain people have been tried and convicted, what will be accomplished by an investigation and going over that subject by the committee?

Mr. BLEASE. The trial concerned conditions growing out of the operation of the bank at Beaufort, S. C. What we want to get at is the land bank at Columbia. I have asked the proper department of the Government to investigate conditions there, and the officials of the department promised to do it, but the only thing they have done is to send two little fellows and one poor little girl from Beaufort to the penitentiary, making "goats" of them, to use a common expression, while the big men in Columbia have not been touched. If the Treasury Department and the Attorney General's department are standing behind these people, and upholding them in their rascality, we desire to know it. It seems that they are not only doing that, but are working with the chairman of the committee trying to keep him from bringing the resolution to which I have referred on the floor of the Senate. I know that is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not taking any position with regard to the resolution offered by the Senator, but I was simply under the impression that the conditions of which he complains were under investigation by the courts.

Mr. BLEASE. The conditions to which I have referred were not under investigation.

Mr. FLETCHER. And I was going to suggest to the Senator that all these data which he is submitting here, it would seem, should be taken up with the committee rather than merely to be put in the RECORD.

Mr. BLEASE. If the committee will not let it be taken up, the only recourse I have left is to bring it on this floor. I can not make the committee do what I ask. I go to other committeemen about bills of mine but they do not pay any attention to my requests; so they have driven me to the point where, in order properly to represent my people, I have got to come on this floor.

I will say to the Senator from Florida that I have a letter here in which the writer refers to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], whose name it is stated is on the letterhead of the National Committee for Cooperative Banks, who was sent a copy of the report prepared. The writer of the letter says that information has been obtained recently from Mr. Eugene Myer which she hesitates to put in a letter, and she also refers to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], who made an investigation in connection with the Federal Farm Loan Board. The writer also says that Senator NYE promised to publish the document referred to in the letter, and which I offered for printing as a Senate document some time ago. Other channels have been resorted to, but it seems that we can not get any redress from any other source. Because the committee refuses to report a resolution—I do not care whether it reports it favorably or unfavorably—I do not propose to let the people at home labor under the impression that I am sitting here allowing these things to be done without a protest, and the only place I can make that protest as their representative is on this floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite agree with the Senator that we ought to have the committee act on the matter.

Mr. BLEASE. I appreciate the Senator's inquiry, and I do not mean anything personal to him at all in anything I may have said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the request of the Senator from South Carolina will be complied with and the matter referred to by him will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNION, S. C., March 22, 1928.

Senator COLE L. BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.:

Regret notice from morning papers probability investigation Federal land and intermediate credit banks of Columbia likely go over until next session Congress. Failure intermediate credit bank function as intend resulting in distress to many whom have for past two years paid in full, and have every right expect rediscount of their papers this year, which is due to absolute inefficiency in Columbia office. Should be investigated immediately to afford relief.

UNION COUNTY AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ASSOCIATION,
W. W. ALMAN, Secretary-Treasurer.

[From the Beaufort Gazette, Thursday, March 15, 1928]

PUSH IT RAPIDLY

We are greatly interested in the proposed land-bank probe asked for by a resolution introduced in the United States Senate by Hon. COLE L. BLEASE, of this State. The preamble of his resolution calls attention to the great expense of the Government in recent criminal prosecutions, the length of time consumed in that trial, and to statements brought out in the course of the testimony. We agree with the honorable Senator that there appears to be plenty of grounds on which to base such a resolution for an investigation. It would appear that all is not well in Columbia.

We are equally interested in the bill introduced in the House by Congressman B. B. HARE, of this district, calling on and requiring the intermediate credit bank of Columbia to give credits on all loans made by farmers of this territory to the extent of net sales and deposits. We feel that such steps should immediately be taken inasmuch as it appears, though we may be wrong, that the intermediate credit bank was aware that the sales and deposits were available for a period prior to the closing of the Beaufort bank. Many of the witnesses in the recent criminal action stated that the officials of the Columbia bank were "in on all."

The Government made a serious mistake when it undertook to enter the banking game in competition with private capital and business. Judging from happenings in this community this effort has been a disastrous failure and resulted in hardships to many of our people. We urge immediate steps be taken to "take the Government out of business." It is not fair to legitimate money lenders, to banking institutions, and business. The Government control of railroads, though a war measure, was an absolute failure. The control of shipping has been nothing more than a mess. Now the banking game is turning out a dismal failure.

In principle the intermediate-bank plan might be good, but our study of the situation leads us more and more to urge curtailment of its activities. Under the present system the farmers get money too easily. They are then led to overproduce, which always means for lower prices and losses. The overhead is entirely too great when they are forced to carry crop insurance to meet any losses suffered by the mortgagees—intermediate credit bank; commission charges; interest on the loans, which are usually twice as much as a farmer should have—and other costs of production make it almost impossible for him to come out of the large end of the horn. The legitimate farmer has a very small chance against the large farmer bolstered up with Government funds.

Mr. Charles Mitchell has been carrying the fight for two years. He has struck back at the intermediate credit bank and alleges, in effect, the things set forth by Senator BLEASE and Congressman HARE in their resolutions and bills. The case has got off on a question of jurisdiction of the courts. Thus far Mr. Mitchell, through his attorneys, Thomas & Thomas, of the local bar, and Buist, of Charleston, have been successful in the fight. The intermediate credit bank, plaintiff in the action, has succeeded in getting the case before the highest tribunal in the land. The matter will be argued before the United States Supreme Court during the month. It behooves each and every Beaufortonian to stand by Mr. Mitchell and his attorneys, give them of what information they may have regarding transactions between the local associations and the Columbia Government banks. A successful fight by Mr. Mitchell will, in effect, accomplish the same things sought by the Government investigations. We welcome the investigations also and hope they will be had.

All local citizens are urged to back the local leaders in this fight to secure justice to all concerned.

BEAUFORT, S. C., March 12, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: I see by the newspaper that you have introduced in Congress a resolution looking forward to the investigation of the actings and doings of the South Carolina Agricultural Credit Co., of Beaufort, S. C., and the Federal Intermediate Credit Bank of Columbia, S. C., in regard to the alleged $1,250,000 loss and to some $700,000 or $800,000 loss to farmers in this community by the 1926 deal through the officers of the South Carolina Agricultural Credit Co.

In this transaction the Beaufort bank, of this place, was wiped out of existence, and many other concerns, and R. C. Horne, jr., president of the South Carolina Agricultural Credit Co., and W. E. Richardson, president of the Beaufort bank, were convicted in the Federal court and sentenced to two years each in the Atlanta Penitentiary, and Miss Beulah Harvey, the secretary and treasurer of the South Carolina Agricultural Credit Co., was convicted along with them and sentenced to six months in the Aiken County jail. Since then W. E. Richardson and W. P. Jay, president and cashier, respectively, of the Beaufort bank, have been convicted in the State court and sentenced to one year each in jail or to pay a fine of $500. There are several other cases to be tried in the Federal court against some of these parties, including Richardson, Horne, and Miss Harvey, and several more to be tried in the State court against the officers of the Beaufort bank. It seems to have been a very complete deal.

As you know I have been living here since 1900, practicing law, and I think I am as familiar as anyone else with the community, and was appointed receiver for the Beaufort bank when it was closed, and also trustee in bankruptcy for the Truckers Supply Co., a crate factory that was swamped in the transaction, and have had access to a good many of the records. I am writing to offer you the benefit of any information I can furnish you, as well as my services, in any possible way to bring to light the truth of this awful calamity to our community.

With kindest regards, always, I am,

Yours very respectfully,

(Signed) W. J. THOMAS.

You would likely unearth a bad state of affairs in these agricultural banks over the country.

THOMAS.

[Letter from Union, S. C., March 19, 1928]

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you about a matter of considerable importance to a good many tenant farmers of this county, and I am writing you at my own instance, inasmuch as I feel that you would like to be advised of matters seriously affecting any considerable portion of your constituency, and especially where a Federal institution is concerned.

It has been the custom of a good many of our tenant farmers who own their own stock to borrow money through an association here known as the Union County Agricultural Association and get their papers handled through the Federal intermediate credit bank at Columbia, S. C. It is my understanding that the association, which has on deposit with the intermediate credit bank $10,000 of bonds, does not owe them anything. The association, as I understand, is liable for all papers handled and discounted with the intermediate credit bank. It would seem that if the intermediate credit bank was intended to be of any service whatever to the tenant farmer that a chattel mortgage covering a good mule, a wagon, farming implements, a cow or two, and all crops produced by him during the current year with the landlord's lien waived—and indorsed by the association—should be good for $150 at least.

And yet, I am informed, the intermediate credit bank has refused and refuses to handle such papers unless the landlord makes a financial statement and shows by such statement that he is worth enough to guarantee the payment of the paper.

In other words, no papers are discounted that fall much under the standard of safety found in a gold bond.

I do not know what you can do about this situation, if anything; but as my information was that this bank was supposed to be of some usefulness to the small tenant farmer I am writing you these facts.

It seems to me that this matter should be investigated, and while I am prompted in writing you by the disappointment suffered by a good many tenant farmers and other farmers, yet I do not care for my name to be disclosed.

With kind regards, I am,

Yours truly,

[Letter received from two prominent farmers]

MADISON, FLA., March 17, 1928.

Hon. COLEMAN L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Knowing your record for fair play, we decided to send another letter to Mr. Stevens, secretary, the Federal Land Bank of Columbia, S. C., and forward a copy to a Senator for each of the States covered by the activity or nonactivity of this bank. Hence the attached letter.

This year, feeling confident that the bank upon the showing made would gladly increase the loan this small amount asked, we bought four additional mules and went on with the construction of three new tobacco sheds and a small warehouse. However, the Hon. W. F. Stevens dismisses the application without any or no excuse.

We really need this loan this year. He has been such an autocrat about the matter that we decided to call the matter to the attention of a representative of each of the three States, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.

You will notice that he declined the loan for $8,000 made years ago when there have been three applications before his executive committee since, and each one waived aside with no intention on his part of assisting the farmer.

Have you any suggestion to make as to what should be our move? Thanking you, and with high regards, we are,

Very truly yours, ——— ———.

[Letter from a North Carolinian]

ASHEVILLE, N. C., March 11, 1928.

United States Senator COLE BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Read in paper that you have started investigation of certain officials, and particularly of the Columbia (S. C.) Land Bank. This is necessary, particularly of the methods that have been used by certain officials of the Farm Loan Board in spending the taxpayers' money in sending so-called examiners around the country to carry on a "blackjacking" method of punishing every one who differs from the puny political theories of their own bunch. In many States they have been known to do this. D. J. Coughlin, the right-hand bower of Charles E. Lobdell—who draws $25,000 a year of the farmers' money, against the farmers' wishes—being probably the most notorious of all. The records of the Committee on Banking and Currency show that Coughlin drew money from the Treasury as examiner at the same time he drew money from private land-bank funds in the office of the fiscal agent, to do another piece of work, and Coughlin should now be headed for the same trip that his brother examiners wish to send innocent South Carolina farm cooperative officers. But no, Coughlin has a stand-in, while the farmers of your State have a stand-out.

By all means investigate this whole land-bank plot. If the entire truth regarding the alleged administration of the Federal farm-loan system ever leaks out, it will surely prove as interesting reading as Teapot Dome or the purchase of Senate seats. Because the gang now buy advertising space in farm papers, the farmers no longer can read the truth in their papers, which is another way of putting the screws on those who should be telling the farmers the truth, since the farmers are the ones that those papers depend upon for their income and business.

Let us have a real congressional investigation of the whole farm-loan enterprise. I wish Senator WALSH of Montana could be made examiner of that committee.

Yours for the good work.

BEAUFORT, S. C., March 18, 1928.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Since the conference which you arranged with Senator ROBINSON for Congressmen HARE and STEVENSON and myself, I have been thinking about the political aspects of the Beaufort situation. So I am calling attention to their end of it, thinking you may have occasion to pass it on to Senator ROBINSON.

It seems to me that the experience our farmers have had and are having would appeal to the independent Republican farmers of the West. They are likely to have a Coolidge-school Republican candidate. Our experience demonstrates what farmers receive from that kind of Republicans. I judge farmers everywhere would get a different deal from the Republican insurgent bloc were they in power; but they are in all probability going to be asked to vote for the other kind of Republican.

The administration is backing Arnold. With all that he has done and is doing they stand behind him.

Whatever may be said about his attitude and actions before the failure at Beaufort, which he precipitated, his actions since and his present attitude are enough to arouse the indignation of farmers everywhere.

Backed by the administration, the Department of Justice and the Treasury Department are to-day, I understand from you and Senator ROBINSON, standing against any further agitation of this Beaufort situation.

It seems to me the administration has committed itself to Arnold's support. Certainly the Republican organization of the Senate seems to have done so by blocking your resolution. This latter may be held to be the result of a general policy against any further investigation rather than definite opposition to yours.

But the administration is tied to Arnold's record in South Carolina. That is the point I would make with Senator ROBINSON.

You have already called attention to what that record is. But when hearings bring out the ruthlessness with which their unjust measures were carried out there must follow a resentment among all fair-minded men. For instance, when the Government investigators during the trial at Columbia threatened witnesses for the defense in an effort to run them out of Columbia they were giving evidence of an attitude that had characterized the dealings of the Treasury Department and the Department of Justice in this whole affair.

Thanking you again for your valuable aid in this situation, I am,

Very truly,

MIDDENDORF, S. C., March 17, 1928.

Senator COLE L. BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We are inclosing clipping from the State of 15th. We would be glad to give information to this committee of the banks of Chesterfield County (G. W. Duvall, president of every bank in county) as to treatment the farmers are receiving through these banks in getting money through intermediate credit company to finance farms for 1925. This committee should have our testimony, and if possible be prosecuted.

Hope that you will use your influence for the poor farmers that are being robbed of their rights. With best wishes for your success,

Sincerely,

UNION, S. C., March 22, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I beg to acknowledge yours of the 21st instant. I think the following parties would be willing to furnish affidavits along the line suggested, to wit: W. W. Alman, secretary Union County Agricultural Association, Union, S. C.; J. M. Jeter, jr., director of the association, Union, S. C.; T. M. Kitchens, farmer, Carlisle, S. C.; S. G. Layton, farmer, Union, S. C.; John D. Jeffries, jr., farmer, Jonesville, S. C.; L. P. Thomas, farmer, Carlisle, S. C.; Manning T. Jeter, Union, S. C.; Andrew Johnson, farmer, Buffalo, S. C.

The first two mentioned—W. W. Alman and J. M. Jeter, jr.—by reason of their connection with the Agricultural Loan Association in the county are, in my opinion, able to give you full facts throwing light on the situation. I am sure that they will readily do so, although I have never talked with them. I feel they would have no hesitation about it, as the attempt to handle papers by the association through the intermediate credit bank has been such a failure that all parties connected with the association are disgusted.

The intermediate credit bank could have been a big benefit to the farmers in this section, and doubtless all over the State, in the present plight of the farmers generally; but instead of that it is not worth a "hill of beans."

They intend that no papers shall be discounted except those that rank in safety along with Government bonds and furnish only credit to the rich men and nothing to the poor farmer, who is willing to put up a mule, worth the amount of his loan, a wagon, and a cow or two, and a mortgage over all crops to be produced by himself and family during the year on a one-horse farm, with the rent lien waived for the amount asked in such loans, $150; then it is practically useless for the poor farmer. But they require, in addition to the above, that the landlord himself, who is not borrowing, make a financial statement, and that statement shows the note could be collected from that source.

Yours truly,

NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR COOPERATIVE BANKS,
New York, March 22, 1928.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Accept my hearty congratulations on your resolution to investigate the farm loan system. It occurs to me you may find the inclosed report on farm loan relief useful. Senator NYE asked permission sometime ago to publish it as a Senate document, but I do not think he has yet done so. The first three sections are pertinent to your resolution—as you know you can't investigate one of these systems without going into all three. While I did not deal primarily with intermediates, since the land bank appointees have been running the intermediates, one gets a line on certain reasons why both systems have gone badly. If it suits your personal interest to make this document generally available, I shall be glad to have you.

In serving this committee as a voluntary, unpaid secretary I have had pleasant association in regard to farm loan matters with a number of Senators. I think first of Senator FLETCHER, who will, I am sure, answer any questions about me if you desire to ask him. I worked hard with Senator HOWELL in 1924, when he compelled the Farm Loan Board to produce proof of misappliance of farm loan funds and mismanagement. If you glance at this letterhead you will find Senator DAVID WALSH'S name—interesting especially because he is on the committee before which your resolution pends. He has a copy of the inclosed report, which he wrote me he intended to read. I hope that was not one of the intentions which makes a new cobblestone for Mephistopheles's domain!

I have certain information, gotten from Eugene Meyer recently, that might prove of interest to you, but hesitate to write it. I should be obliged if you would send me such RECORDS as contain your speeches and other material.

Sincerely,

GERTRUDE MATHEWS SHELBY.

P. S.—In the March, 1927, Farm and Fireside was published an interview of mine with Huston Thompson that was another rather effective broadside. Doubtless you can get it from the Congressional Library. If not, and you are interested, I will send you a copy. This related to the withholding of important information from 350,000 farmer stockholders, both by the banks and by the Federal board.

IS AMORTIZED FARM LOAN A PANACEA OR A PLAGUE?

(By James B. Morman, economist, Federal Farm Loan Board)

The best advice that can be given to farmers is to keep out of debt. The census of 1920 showed that 1,461,306 farm owners had mortgages on their farms; the number of mortgaged farms has undoubtedly greatly increased since.

What are these debt-burdened farmers to do? To what extent would amortization of their mortgages aid them? Does this plan of repaying loans give farmers larger incomes by reducing the amount of interest they have to pay? If so, what has been this gain to them? To what extent has the amortization plan of paying off mortgages been adopted by money-lending agencies? And, lastly, what are the limitations of this method of paying off debts in protecting borrowers against foreclosure? These questions relate to the financial and social welfare of American farmers.

By "amortization" is meant the method of repaying a loan with interest by regular annual or semiannual installments covering a long period of time. An "installment" includes interest and part of the principal. A borrower, therefore, pays off his debt a little at a time and pays interest only on the unpaid balance of the principal. The amount of an installment is determined by the rate of interest and the number of years for which a loan is granted.

With a view of cutting down to some extent the amount of interest farmers would have to pay, Congress incorporated in the farm loan act (1916) the amortization plan of repaying loans. The act provides that loans may run 5 to 40 years, at the option of the borrower. The direct benefit to a borrower in the interest he has to pay is shown in the following comparison of this method with a straight mortgage loan for the same amount, rate of interest, and period of loan:

Comparison at the end of 34 years:
Under straight loan plan—
34 interest payments of $60 each	$2,040.00
Principal unpaid	1,000.00
	3,040.00
Under amortization plan—
34 installments, paying both interest and principal	2,338.16
Saving	701.84

During the 34 years that the amortized loan is being repaid the total amount of money a borrower would pay back on a loan of $1,000 would be $2,338.16, of which $1,338.76 is interest and $1,000 principal. That is to say, a borrower pays in interest alone $338.16 more than the amount of his original debt of $1,000. Therefore the total toll exacted by interest out of the labor and capital of a farmer, if his loan should run the full 34 years, is nearly 134 per cent. The toll exacted by interest from the labor and capital of a farmer on a straight mortgage for 34 years would be 204 per cent. In either case the toll is enormous and a constant drain on a farmer's income.

The annual installment on an amortized loan is always greater than the interest payment on a straight loan. On a $1,000 loan the installment is $70 as compared with $60 paid as interest. This difference ($10) is applied in reducing the principal of a debt; with each succeeding year the amortizement on a debt is a little more until the loan is entirely paid.

There is, however, a temporary disadvantage in the amortization of a loan because the differential amortizement is always an additional drain on a borrower's income. Neither the installment on an amortized loan nor the amount of interest on a straight mortgage changes during the loan period; for a small loan of $1,000 the difference is only $10; but on loans ranging from $10,000 to $50,000 the difference ranges from $100 to $500 a year, according to the size of the loan. The difference has to be provided every year by a debtor, no matter how unfavorable the crop or livestock returns may happen to be from season to season.

It is not much consolation to a farmer to know that this difference is always the minimum amount applied on his mortgage toward its reduction if it becomes a burden for him to provide the amount which, if unpaid, may lead to the loss of his farm. Under any circumstances this additional amount is an extra drain on his income and possibly explains the inability of so many farmers to meet their installments regularly.

It is evident from the foregoing that the amortization of farm mortgages is not a panacea for all the ills, actual and imaginary, which affect the welfare of the farmer.

Among other things, it was expected that farmers borrowing under the Federal farm loan system would not only get into debt on an economical basis, but would even do so profitably. The principle is enunciated by authority of the Farm Loan Board as follows:

"The Federal farm loan act is a law the intention of which is to make it possible for the farmers to make money by borrowing money. Its intention is to place money within reach of the farmer on such terms as to convert the farm mortgage into a source of profit."

These are very remarkable expectations, and the question is whether or not they have been realized. It would be rather unusual in the mortgage credit field to have a credit bring to the debtor an increase of income in the face of all the drains on income which have been shown to attach to borrowing money on farm mortgage. The intention may be good, but is it likely to be fulfilled?

It is undoubtedly based on the provision of the farm loan act which requires that loans shall be for productive purposes. But is not this expectation of a profit from running into debt based upon failure to appreciate the fact that borrowing for productive purposes also means a corresponding burden of expenses, interest, and depreciation of capital equipment during the continuance of a loan?

It is not the difference paid as interest but the debt itself which is the real burden on a farmer. The debt must be paid either by amortization or in a lump sum. This burden, moreover, is intensified with the lapse of time because of capital depreciation, a factor seldom taken into consideration. For long before 10 years have expired many forms of capital equipment will have been partially or wholly worn out and the farmer will be no better off as a result of his borrowing unless he has been able to save and set aside annually sufficient to cover the value of depreciation.

On account of the precariousness of agriculture and the present difficulty of a farmer being able to save at all, he may be even worse off financially because he will still be owing nearly 87 per cent of his debt and also be under the necessity of replacing part of his capital equipment in order to continue effective farm operations. It is plain, therefore, that there are grave financial limitations attached to borrowing and repaying a loan under the amortization method so far as providing a farmer with the means of escaping the great burden and danger of debt itself is concerned.

The conclusion is borne out by the result of the operation of the Federal farm loan system. On March 27, 1923, six years had elapsed since the first loan was made under this system. To-day three clearly defined tendencies are noticeable: (1) Many borrowers have already increased their mortgage indebtedness by additional loans when the farm appraisements warranted such an increase; (2) many borrowers have been unable to pay the installments on their loans and the Federal land banks are carrying a steadily increasing amount of delinquent payments; and (3) many farmers coming in as new borrowers are mortgaging their farms to pay off short-time or personal indebtedness incurred during the past few years as a result of unprofitable farm operations.

These tendencies are plainly discernible in general rural credit conditions throughout the United States and they are corroborated in the case of thousands of loans made through the Federal farm loan system. They are not very promising for the future of agricultural development. The Secretary of Agriculture has already warned the country of the danger of too easy credit conditions. The danger is in our midst and has not been removed by the amortization of farm mortgage loans. In fact, it is likely that this method has increased rather than decreased the danger. Thousands of farmers have already become delinquent in their installments under the easiest method of repaying farm mortgages yet devised, so that it is evident that interest-bearing debt is one of the greatest dangers to future improvement in agricultural conditions.

That farmers' debts, in many cases at least, have not proven profitable is evident from the fact that the amortization of loans has not prevented delinquencies in the payment of installments; it is now evident that this method of repaying loans does not prevent the foreclosure of farms. Evidently the amortization of loans does not remove the greatest danger of farm mortage debt.

Neither the amortization method of repaying loans nor the beneficent intention of Congress has been able to save farmers from the fear of foreclosure. The policy which seems to have animated friend and foe alike is to fleece the farmer for all he is worth. Large numbers of farms have been sold under the sheriff's hammer in behalf of Federal and joint-stock land banks as mortgages. The heartlessness of money sharks is not unknown to the Federal farm loan system, for neither the farmer who fails to pay an installment on his loan nor his local association which has indorsed his mortgage can ward off the foreclosure proceedings, as this policy is being mercilessly carried out by both kinds of land banks.

Taking a broad view of agricultural conditions as they have developed during the past few years it is evident that farm mortgage credit has not brought such great financial relief to farmers as was anticipated. While some benefits have materialized as a result of the operation of the Federal loan system, the easier opportunities which farmers now have of plunging deeper into debt are increasing their financial difficulties and dangers. Debt can only be paid by farmers getting larger incomes.

Of this be certain, credit can not enslave a farmer to debt and free him from its shackles at the same time.

That this danger is still imminent is evident from a glance at the following table, prepared primarily for the purpose of showing the regular drain on a farmer's income that occurs on long-time amortized loans and the enormous total toll of interest which is taken during the life of a loan:

Amount of debt, total paid as interest, and semiannual installments on amortized loans

Amount of debt	Amount paid as interest on debt		Semiannual installments
	At 5½ per cent	At 6 per cent	At 5½ per cent	At 6 per cent
$1,000	$1,242.47	$1,304.23	$32.50	$35.00
$2,000	2,484.94	2,608.35	65.00	70.00
$3,000	3,727.41	3,912.56	97.50	105.00
$4,000	4,969.88	5,216.71	130.00	140.00
$5,000	6,212.35	6,520.90	162.50	175.00
$6,000	7,454.82	7,825.09	195.00	210.00
$7,000	8,697.29	9,129.27	227.50	245.00
$8,000	9,939.76	10,433.50	260.00	280.00
$9,000	11,182.23	11,737.63	292.50	315.00
$10,000	12,424.70	13,041.86	325.00	350.00
$15,000	18,636.18	19,620.93	487.50	524.57
$20,000	24,848.16	26,162.23	650.00	699.42
$25,000	31,060.20	32,702.00	812.50	874.28

A study of this table will convince the most skeptical that amortization of farm mortgages is not a panacea for the burden of debt.

Two things are especially noticeable: (1) That in each case a borrower pays much more as interest than the amount of the debt itself; and (2) that the drain on a borrower's income through the payment of an installment every six months, while not heavy on small loans, becomes a real burden when the debt is large.

From this drain on income there is no possible relief. Though it is lighter in the end than interest on straight mortgage, because of the gradual repayment of the debt itself by amortization, nevertheless the drain on a farmer's income is both constant and enormous, which often deprives his family of the necessities of life, keeps him on the rack of perpetual toil and worry, and finally involves him into bankruptcy or foreclosure proceedings. From these possibilities—yea, even probabilities and actualities—long-time amortization of farm-mortgage loans does not protect farmers heavily burdened with debt.

The dangers attached to debt, then, are not removed by the amortization plan of repaying farm mortgages. Delinquencies in the payment of installments occur the same as in the case of the payment of interest on straight mortgage loans. In fact, for the first few years the danger of delinquencies in amortization payments is even greater than under straight mortgages because of the added increment of debt payment which is included in each installment of an amortized loan.

Nor has the farmer been relieved of the danger of foreclosure, for the nonpayment of installments has led to that unhappy event. Even if a farmer is able to pay his installment regularly, without making any additional payment on the reduction of his debt, the deterioration of capital equipment, the gradual loss of soil fertility, and the approach of old age which lowers a borrower's efficiency—these and other factors have a tendency to perpetuate a mortgage indefinitely, as it has done in Germany for many generations, and to bind farmer debtors with shackles which have been made easy to forget but exceedingly difficult to remove. This is the prospective heritage of the children of farmers who have long-time amortized mortgages on their farms.

ROAD ACROSS KAIBAB INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 245) to make immediately available the appropriation for a road across the Kaibab Indian Reservation. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

In explanation I will say that $10,000 were appropriated in the last Interior Department appropriation bill for this purpose indicated by the joint resolution, and the joint resolution merely provides that that $10,000 shall be immediately available for the building of the road, which is to run across the Kaibab Indian Reservation in the northern part of Arizona. If the road is to be built, it is desired to have the money now so it will be possible to build the road this year.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, do I understand that the joint resolution comes from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SMOOT. I was authorized after seeing a majority of the committee to report it. It had been previously referred to the committee.

Mr. BRATTON. I wondered when the committee had considered it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is how it was done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation of $10,000 for the improvement and maintenance of the road across the Kaibab Indian Reservation, northern Arizona, en route to Grand Canyon National Park, as contained in the Interior Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1929, approved March 7, 1928, shall be available for expenditure upon the approval of this resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to St. Johns River Development Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to these bills.

AMENDMENT OF WORLD WAR VETERANS' ACT

Mr. BRATTON introduced a bill (S. 3746) to amend section 500 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief reference to the bill.

Under existing law, a veteran of the World War may institute a suit against the Veterans' Bureau in case a disagreement arises between the veteran and the bureau in respect to a contract of insurance. Several suits of that character have been filed throughout the country. Such suits are authorized under section 19 of title 1 of the World War veterans' act of 1924, as amended.

Under section 500 of that act, being a part of title 5 thereof, the court rendering the judgment in any such case may authorize the payment of a reasonable attorney's fee, not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount awarded to be paid counsel representing the veteran. In the administration of the act it has been found that although a veteran may have a just complaint against the bureau, and although it is later determined by a court of competent jurisdiction that he was entirely right and the bureau was altogether wrong, still, upon the successful outcome of his suit against the bureau, the court must fix a reasonable attorney's fee, and is compelled to direct its payment out of the judgment rendered in favor of the veteran.

That to me is entirely unjust and inequitable, and the bill I have just introduced authorizes the court to fix a reasonable attorney's fee not to exceed 10 per cent of the award made, and expressly provides that it shall be paid by the bureau, not out of the money adjudicated in favor of the veteran but in addition thereto.

Obviously, if a veteran falls into a disagreement with the bureau and believes that he is entirely right and that the bureau is utterly wrong, still, if he is compelled to obligate himself to pay a reasonable attorney's fee, either from his personal means or the sum recovered, it has a deterring effect upon him. He is not free and untrammeled.

If the bureau is wrong, and the court so determines, in my judgment, the bureau should pay the reasonable fee for counsel representing the veteran. That is what is intended to be brought about by the bill just introduced.

I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to the measure, and express the hope that it may have the early attention of his committee in order that a gross wrong may be righted before the present session of Congress adjourns.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will not the Senator state whether there is any precedent for legislation such as he proposes?

Mr. BRATTON. I do not recall for the moment any precedent, but I do say that, regardless of precedent or the lack of it, it is oppressive to enforce that kind of a law against a veteran of the World War in determining whether he shall engage in litigation with the bureau under circumstances which he believes establish the justice of his cause and the injustice of the attitude of the bureau. In every case where the veteran is sustained, under existing law, the attorney's fee must be paid out of the money awarded to the veteran.

I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to a recent case that came under my observation. There a veteran instituted a suit of this kind against the bureau. He recovered approximately $7,000. The court granting the judgment determined that a fee of nearly $700 was reasonable and directed that it be paid out of the judgment so rendered. The court could not do otherwise. The court is not subject to criticism. He was compelled to yield to the strict mandate of existing law. The bill I have just proposed will authorize the court in such a case to fix the attorney's fee not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount awarded and require that the bureau pay it in addition to the money awarded the veteran.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As a member of the committee, I shall be glad to give the bill special consideration.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think in some cases that have gone before the court if the attorney's fee had been charged against the Veterans' Bureau official who forced them into the court, it would have been real justice.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill introduced by the Senator from New Mexico will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The regular order is demanded.

Are there further bills or joint resolutions to be introduced?

DECORATIONS FOR OFFICERS

Mr. BLEASE. A few days ago I gave notice that I would submit an amendment to House bill 5898, to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered. I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be read, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and printed.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BLEASE was read, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 4, after line 21, insert the following:

"And be it further enacted, That all recommendations for decoration by the United States of America now pending before the War Department, Navy Department, or Marine Corps for services rendered during the World War be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and awards made in such cases as the conduct of those recommended shows them to be entitled and deserving of the same."

EQUITABLE USE OF THE WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE

Mr. KING submitted a resolution (S. Res. 181), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas by act of Congress approved May 13, 1924, the President was authorized to designate three special commissioners to cooperate with the United States of Mexico for the purpose of studying the equitable use of the waters of the Rio Grande River below Fort Quitman, Tex., with a view to the proper utilization of said waters for irrigation and other beneficial uses; and

Whereas by joint resolution approved March 3, 1927, said act of May 13, 1924, was so amended that said commission was required also to study the question of the equitable use of the waters of the lower Colorado River for the purpose of securing information upon which to base a treaty with the Government of Mexico relative to the use of the waters of both the Rio Grande and the Colorado Rivers; and

Whereas the President appointed three commissioners, Dr. Elwood Mead, Gen. Lansing H. Beach, and W. E. Anderson, to meet with representatives of Mexico to consider the matters and questions involved in said act of May 13, 1924, and said joint resolution, and said commissioners are now meeting and carrying on negotiations with commissioners of the United States of Mexico; and

Whereas it is claimed that said commissioners are considering whether additional water from the Rio Grande River supplied by tributaries arising in Mexico may be had for use on lands in the State of Texas, and the question of confirming claims made by American citizens to the waters from said river heretofore used upon lands in the State of Texas, and also the question as to what, if any, water from the Colorado River Mexico or its nationals are entitled to; and

Whereas the waters of the Colorado River have their origin in the United States and not in Mexico and are required for the domestic needs of the citizens of the United States and for the irrigation of lands within the United States, and the granting of any of the waters of the Colorado River to Mexico, except such limited amount as may have been used for the cultivation of lands in Mexico, would infringe upon the rights of the United States and the sovereign States of Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico, and California, as well as many citizens of the United States, and would result in irreparable injury to the United States and said sovereign States and citizens of said States; that any treaty that might attempt to limit the rights of the United States or said sovereign States or citizens of the United States, or to interfere with their ownership of or their rights in and to the waters of the Colorado River, would constitute an invasion of their rights: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Interior be, and they are hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all instructions given by said departments to said commissioners, including communications made by the Reclamation Service to said commissioners or persons interested in the negotiation of a treaty between the United States and Mexico regarding the waters of said rivers, and the disposition, allocation, or control of the same, and also copies of all communications between the United States and Mexico concerning the duties and work of said commissioners relating to the distribution, allocation, or control of the waters of said rivers.

COOPERATION IN THE COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I present a newspaper article, entitled "The barons on cooperation," relative to the coal industry, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BARONS ON COOPERATION

Charles M. Schwab, in his capacity as head of the bituminous interests subsidiary to the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, yesterday tried valiantly to "glad-hand" the Senate committee investigating the soft-coal problem.

Mr. Schwab attempted to turn questions directed to his views on the validity of contracts with union labor by observing appealingly that "I'm just a plain, blunt steel worker out of the mills. I can't answer hypothetical questions." At another stage this simple proletarian observed that he had been too busy playing golf to keep up with the policies of his subordinates. Finally the humble golfer-steel worker announced his belief that "face-to-face meeting is the solution of the labor problem."

All this simplicity and kindliness in high places is very touching, but if the Schwabs, the Mellons, and the Rockefellers would transmit some of it to their managing executives the effect would be more impressive. The day before the appearance of this trio the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee had before it Mr. W. G. Warden, chairman of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. And his attitude toward "face-to-face" cooperation was hard-boiled to the limit. "I would not go into any conference," he said, "which included representatives of the United Mine Workers of America." As for the public, the third and most innocent party to the perennial coal dispute, it "doesn't need to be looked after," says Mr. Warden.

The barons of the coal industry are strong on talking cooperation. Their managers, by their actions, show on every occasion that the men at the top are either powerless or insincere. It is a fair guess that the former of the two alternatives is not the truth. And the condition reached by the coal industry, a great public utility which protracted anarchy is intolerable, is not one in which palpable insincerity among its present owners will prove a winning game.

THOMAS W. CUNNINGHAM, RECUSANT WITNESS

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a day or two ago I submitted a report from the Special Committee Investigating Expenditures in Senatorial Primary and General Elections, and stated at the time that I would later submit a resolution and would ask its adoption by the Senate. Pursuant to the notice given, I did offer a resolution. I direct the Senate's attention to the report, and also to the resolution, which I ask the clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 179, submitted by Mr. KING on the 22d instant, as follows:

Whereas it appears from the report of the Special Committee Investigating Expenditures in Senatorial Primary and General Elections that a witness, Thomas W. Cunningham, twice called before the committee making inquiry as directed by the Senate under Senate Resolution 195 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, declined to answer certain questions relative and pertinent to the matter then under inquiry:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of said Thomas W. Cunningham wherever found, and to bring the said Thomas W. Cunningham before the bar of the Senate, then and there or elsewhere as it may direct, to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate, through its said committee, or the President of the Senate, may propound, and to keep the said Thomas W. Cunningham in custody to await further order of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah whether this is the only proceeding the committee are going to ask the Senate to take or whether, in addition to this, they are going to ask the Senate to pass a resolution referring the matter to the district attorney of the District. Is it the intention of the committee to ask that?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is my understanding that later further action will be taken by the special committee, and the Senate will be asked to take action looking to proceedings against Mr. Cunningham under the statute which makes it an offense for a witness to refuse to answer pertinent and proper questions when such person is before a Senate committee. Just before the termination of the last session of Congress the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], a member of the special committee, reported for the committee the contumacy of Mr. Cunningham and asked for a warrant of arrest. Owing to the jam—I will not use the word "filibuster"—in the closing hours of the session the resolution offered by the Senator from West Virginia was not considered. The report submitted on the 22d instant, and which is before the Senate, brings the matter down to date and asks for the same action by the Senate as was recommended in the partial report presented by the Senator from West Virginia.

As stated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in addition to the Senate taking steps to punish the witness for contempt, it may refer the matter to the district attorney. For the present the committee is only asking for the adoption of the resolution just read and the proceedings called for thereunder. The witness Cunningham appeared before the committee on two occasions. He refused to answer proper and pertinent questions submitted to him. Upon the occasion of his second appearance before the committee full opportunity was afforded him to answer the questions first asked of him and to purge himself of his contempt, but he persisted in his obdurate course and adhered to his refusal to answer. The committee unanimously report that his conduct warrants and requires action by the Senate as called for in the resolution now being considered.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not interrupting the Senator for the purpose of criticizing the procedure. I have no objection to this procedure; but there is also another thing that it seems to me the committee ought to do, as we did in the case of Mr. Stewart—not only have a warrant issued but, in addition, refer the matter to the prosecuting attorney here.

When the witness refused to answer the questions propounded by the committee, he violated a statute of the United States which makes it a misdemeanor to do that; and there is a prosecution going on now in that case in addition to the issuing of the warrant by the Senate. They are two separate things. What I wanted to call the committee's attention to was that it seemed to me that in the case of Mr. Cunningham we ought to follow the same procedure that we followed in the case of Mr. Stewart, let this warrant be issued—I have no objection to this resolution—and also refer the matter under the statute to the prosecuting attorney here, so that he can take the necessary steps to present the matter to a grand jury.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that course has been taken in a number of instances.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator seems to be laboring under the impression that the Senate must take one or the other of the two courses, and not both.

Mr. KING. No; it may take both.

Mr. NORRIS. Why not take both, then?

Mr. KING. I was about to say that; I did not now recommend the reference of the matter to the district attorney because the Senator from West Virginia, who gave attention to the matter and prepared the first report asking for the arrest of Mr. Cunningham, is not here. My view was that as soon as the Senator from West Virginia returned, the committee would meet and recommend the course suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. The action sought to-day by the committee is not intended as a final disposition of the matter. The law was violated by Mr. Cunningham when he refused to answer, and the Senate later will be asked to adopt such course in relation to the same as it may deem to be proper.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I should like to add, if the Senator will pardon me, that I stated to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] yesterday that I intended to call up the resolution this morning and ask for its consideration. He said he would not be here, and I am betraying no confidence when I say that he said he would interpose no objection to the consideration of the resolution. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Utah also that the procedure which has been taken is very proper, and ought to be taken; but I can not myself see any reason why we should not do the same thing in this case that we did in the case of Mr. Stewart.

A warrant was issued in Mr. Stewart's case, and a habeas corpus proceeding was asked for, and that is on its way in the courts; but, in addition to that, he was indicted before a grand jury, and he has pleaded before the grand jury, and he will be tried before a jury in the District of Columbia on that case; and, if found guilty, without regard to the proceedings the Senate is taking, he will be subject to imprisonment in jail.

If Mr. Cunningham has violated the same law that Mr. Stewart violated, I do not myself understand why we should not do the same thing in his case. In other words, the moment he refused to answer a proper question submitted by the investigating committee he committed a misdemeanor, and that is not being pushed in this proceeding. I do not understand why the committee are not asking for that. All we have to do is to pass a resolution referring the matter to the prosecuting attorney here, just as we did in the Stewart case, and then he will take care of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can only repeat what I said a moment ago. The Senator has expressed the view which I entertain. I thought that out of deference to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent on account of illness, no further action would be taken at this time other than that unanimously agreed upon by the committee, and which is embodied in the resolution before us. I shall communicate with him as soon as he replies, and the committee, no doubt, will consider the procedure suggested by the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that, of course, although the other proceeding is entirely separate from this.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, for my own information, and perhaps for the information of others, can the question of the right of the committee to propound a given question, and the right of the witness to answer or not, be determined in the proceeding which the resolution contemplates?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If that is so as a legal matter, why, then, pursue the second course until the first is determined?

Mr. KING. He may, of course, sue out a writ of habeas corpus, the same as Mr. Stewart did.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely.

Mr. KING. But, notwithstanding the fact that the arrest of Mr. Stewart was ordered by the Senate, the question of the violation of the statute was referred to the district attorney. The two proceedings may go forward at the same time. Mr. Stewart halted the action of the Senate by suing out a writ of habeas corpus, by which he seeks to test the legality of the proceedings of the Senate. The same question may be raised, however, after indictment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Quite apart from personalities or the merits of this case, I merely desire to suggest that if the legal matter involved can be determined in the first proceeding, as contemplated by the resolution, why should a given witness be put to two defenses in different courts or in different tribunals? I ask that question for information only.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there are two propositions pending.

Mr. KING. It is in a way an offense against two jurisdictions.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Suppose a warrant is issued in this case and the witness is arrested and brought before the Senate; and suppose he does not sue out a writ of habeas corpus, but answers the question he refused to answer before the committee. He will purge himself in that proceeding, but he will not satisfy the law. If we are always to pursue that course, then any committee of the Senate in an investigation can be held up and delayed, and the witness who refuses to answer a proper question can be cleared of all charges and of all difficulty by later on coming before the Senate and answering the same question when, perhaps, it is too late to do any good in the matter.

The fact is that when he refused to answer a question that was proper, submitted by the committee, right then he committed a misdemeanor, and that does not depend on whether he ever answers the question to the Senate or not. He could, of course, sue out a writ of habeas corpus and take the case to the Supreme Court. If we waited to see what they would do in that case, we would wait two or three years before we commenced another suit, when as a matter of fact they are two entirely distinct kinds of action. One is to compel the witness to answer, the other is to punish him for refusing to answer, and in satisfying the law as to one we do not touch the other. If we always pursue this course, then witnesses who refuse to answer questions submitted by a committee of the Senate will always have the privilege of refusing to answer, delaying, having a warrant issued, and then they can answer the question, in which case they purge themselves in that proceeding, and the object of the Senate in making the investigation in nine times out of ten will be completely frustrated.

In the case of Mr. Stewart, a warrant was issued, he was arrested, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus, and that is on its weary way to the Supreme Court. But the Senate, at the same time it ordered his arrest, passed a resolution referring the matter to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, under a specific statute applying particularly to that kind of a case. The district attorney immediately laid the matter before the grand jury, and an indictment was secured, to which Mr. Stewart has already been required to plead, and in due time that case will be tried.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am merely seeking to get my mind clear as to the procedure. Suppose the Supreme Court, having jurisdiction of the subject matter, should decide in the respondent's favor; what would become of the proceedings in the District of Columbia?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Supreme Court in the other case should decide in his favor, then he will have won his case, and will be entirely clear.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was merely asking in order to have the law cleared up.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I see no reason why the same procedure should not be taken in this case as was observed in the case of Stewart. The recalcitrant witness will be summoned before the Senate to answer for his contempt of the Senate. He may then, by agreeing to testify, purge himself of the contempt, but, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, we should not be compelled every week of the year to be citing people for contempt. They ought to understand that this is a crime, and the statute expressly provides for it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Who determines that it is a crime?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Supreme Court determines it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have some regard for the rights of the citizens——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The statute expressly provides for the certification of the facts to the district attorney for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read the statute:

> Whenever a witness summoned as mentioned in section 102—

That is, a witness testifying before a committee—

> fails to testify, and the facts are reported to either House, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, shall certify that fact, under the seal of the Senate or House, to the district attorney of the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remark that that can be done at any time.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He may be brought before the Senate and dealt with as for contempt, and, at the convenience of the Senate or of the committee, the other procedure can be followed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If brought before the Senate, he could then answer, and I suppose that would terminate the proceeding; that is, if he came in good faith.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In that case the Senate itself would have no right whatever to punish him. The power of the Senate is coercive. He can be imprisoned indefinitely until he agrees to answer the questions propounded to him.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Unless the courts should determine otherwise.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That does not wipe out the crime. He could still be prosecuted.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I think our course here is perfectly clear, to pass this resolution and then, if the Senate sees fit, pass a subsequent resolution referring the commission of the crime, as it is understood to be, to the grand jury for action with respect to that. At present the committee desires to have this resolution passed, and I presume will bring in another resolution covering the other phase of the matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I stated a moment ago that the delay in not asking for reference to the district attorney was out of deference to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to make an observation in view of the disposition just made by the Senate of the Cunningham case. At the same time that a report was filed in that matter the committee submitted a report dealing with the Insull and Schuyler cases. I would have asked consideration of this report except for the absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. As soon as he returns I shall request the Senate to take action upon the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

RADIO REGULATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the further consideration of the conference report on the radio bill.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 2317) continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope there will be no further debate on the conference report. We would like to have it adopted. I understand that debate was closed on it day before yesterday and we were all ready for a vote at that time. There is no opposition to the report, and I understand no one desires to debate it further.

Mr. KING. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. I simply stated what I understood the situation to be day before yesterday.

Mr. KING. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to a statement found, as I recall, in last night's Times, as follows:

> Commissioner O. H. Caldwell, who vigorously protested against the equal distribution clause as originally drawn, regards the revamped section as unworkable and feels that it will work a great hardship on radio listeners who enjoy distant program, as well as many broadcasters.

I want to ask the Senator if he indorses the view of Mr. Caldwell that the measure as now presented is unworkable? If it is, the report should be recommitted. I am not satisfied with the measure before us. It seems to me that it has infirmities and uncertainties, and will not bring relief to the people from the confused and chaotic radio condition.

Mr. DILL. I do not indorse the views of Mr. Caldwell, and I am not surprised that they are so expressed, because, although unconfirmed by the Senate and a mere administrative officer, he sent out propaganda in the form of a letter to all stations in his zone protesting against the provisions of the bill. I think if there has been anything that he has done which would show his unfitness for the position, that alone is enough.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not satisfied with the bill, but it seems evident that no other measure can be secured.

One of the objections to the measure is that it seems to confirm privileges enjoyed by the Radio Trust and its auxiliaries.

The statement appearing in this morning's New York Times is pertinent to this discussion and should attract the attention of the Senate in connection with bills now before committees, and perhaps the attention of the antitrust division of the Department of Justice.

[From the New York Times, March 24, 1928]

R. C. A. IS OUT TO GET VICTOR PERFORMERS—NATION-WIDE CHAIN FOR TALKING MOVIES IS EXPECTED TO BE NEXT STEP WITH F. B. O. AID—ALL SILENT ON PROJECT—PURCHASE OF PHONOGRAPH COMPANY WOULD NOT AFFECT WARNER VITAPHONE CONTRACT

The Radio Corporation's reported impending acquisition of the Victor Talking Machine Co., following the Radio Corporation's purchase of stock in F. B. O., a film producing and distributing organization, was regarded in amusement circles yesterday as the final link in what is to be the greatest chain for the production, distribution, and exhibition of talking movies, besides assuring to radio the hitherto denied services of Victor stars for broadcasting.

The Radio Corporation, already allied with General Electric and Western Electric, which control sound reproduction devices for films, is now allied not only with F. B. O. but also with Pathé, which is associated with F. B. O. and with the Keith-Albee-Proctor theater interests, which own blocks of stock in F. B. O. and Pathé and theaters in most of the principal cities in the country.

WOULD GET STARS, THEATERS

Thus, the Radio Corporation, whose acquisition of stock in F. B. O. was attributed to a desire to participate actively in the motion-picture business through talking movies, would through the purchase of the Victor Co. obtain, it was said, the stars necessary to the greatest exploitation of such movies and assure itself theaters in many cities.

None of the companies directly concerned would discuss the objects of Radio Corporation's activities recently in the amusement field, but these activities have been closely watched and commented upon by motion-picture people, some of whom believe that the corporation is now ready to begin through F. B. O. the production of talking movies with Victor stars.

When radio first entered the movies through the purchase of stock in F. B. O., it was believed then that it had made the connection merely to obtain the production of master films for television exhibition in the event that television became developed sufficiently to permit the screening of such films in the homes of radio set owners. The purchase of Victor caused an enlargement of the conjectures regarding the company's activities.

Warner Bros., producers of Vitaphone, a talking movie in which sound is recorded on a wax disk instead of on film, now has a contract, it was said at this company's offices, with the Victor Co. and the Brunswick Phonograph Co. whereby it may obtain the services of the stars of these companies for Vitaphone. The Warner contract, it was said, would not be affected by any possible activity of radio and F. B. O. in the production of talking movies. Incidentally the Vitaphone and the Movietone, which is produced by Fox, are based on patents controlled by Western Electric and the Warners, while the film recorded sound devices are controlled by General Electric.

MOVE FOR PATENTS SEEN

Some observers in the motion-picture industry saw in radio's activity in the movies only a combination of interests whereby radio could manufacture talking movies equipment based on General Electric patents for the motion-picture industry generally. In support of this it was said that General Electric wanted its devices within the reach of any producer and that radio would not control them exclusively.

Radio, Western Electric, General Electric, and the Victor Cos. have been associated in business for some time. Some of the electrical and acoustic devices on Victor machines are based on patents held by these companies while Victor manufactures machines which are a combined phonograph and radio receiving set, and has an agreement with these companies whereby it receives the benefit of their research and engineering facilities.

This article shows the paramount position, the triumphant if not ruthless position, occupied by the Radio Trust. It would seem that the commission has aided the Radio Corporation in securing the powerful position which it occupies in the broadcasting and radio world. I am afraid the bill before us will not sufficiently curb the activities and limit the growth of this trust but will contribute to its aggrandizement, and so help it in striking down independent producers and those who desire to engage in the radio business not only as producers but as broadcasters.

In this connection I desire to have read a letter which I received this morning which bears upon the Radio Trust, its power and activities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RADIO PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION (INC.),
Chicago, March 24, 1928.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KING: The significant thing about the fight which the Radio Trust is making to perpetuate the present unjust allocation of wave lengths and power, as well as to confirm the radio commissioners, lies in the fact that this "trust" represents aggregate resources of $3,000,000,000.

According to the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Patents, the following are the assets of the five companies involved:

American Telephone & Telegraph Co	$1,841,102,088
General Electric Co	428,328,764
Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co	226,961,520
United Fruit Corporation	203,821,287
Radio Corporation of America	61,976,432

Now, it is announced that the Victor Phonograph Corporation, with another $100,000,000 of assets, is to be added to this array.

Here lies the menace of permitting the air to be monopolized by such a trust. Surely there could be no greater danger to American institutions than that represented by such a control of the air. Congress thinks that through the Federal Radio Commission it is allocating the wave lengths and the power to be used by broadcasting stations throughout the country. As a matter of fact, after a broadcasting station has obtained its allocation from the Federal Radio Commission, it must take its hat in its hands and ask the Radio Trust for permission to use the allotted wave length. It must obtain a license from the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and then it must buy the machinery for its transmitting station from the Western Electric Co., which is the manufacturing end of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

Having done this, it must buy from the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. the wire service necessary to hookup its studio with its transmitting tower. If it wants to be part of a chain, it must buy the wire service for the hookup with the chain stations from the same American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and if the Radio Trust had its way the listener who wants to hear the broadcast from this station must buy his set from the trust or from its licensees.

There are nine outstanding ways in which this great radio monopoly is now seeking to perfect its complete control of the air. These are:

1. By obtaining through chain stations the lion's share of the cleared channels from which the Federal Radio Commission has removed the less-favored stations, and which are looked upon as the choicest gifts of the commission.

2. By obtaining as complete a monopoly of all commercial and experimental wave lengths, in the low wave-length zone as well as in the channels above the present broadcasting field. So far, the Radio Commission has already given the trust and its subsidiaries a vast preponderance of these wave lengths, both in number and in the power which these stations are permitted to use 4,000,000 watts out of 5,000,000.

3. The monopoly of all wireless-telephone development in the United States. This particular monopoly was allotted to the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. as a chief constituent of the Radio Trust in the cross-licensing agreements among the corporations comprising the trust.

4. The monopoly of all wire hookups between stations. This monopoly is now exercised by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., which is thus the deciding factor in all chain-station developments.

5. The monopoly of all wire hookups between transmitting stations and "remote-control" studios and events, now one of the most important features of successful programs. This also is in the hands of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

6. The monopoly of the construction of all radio-transmitting machinery—also a "telephone company" monopoly under the Radio Trust agreements.

7. The monopoly of receiving set manufacture. This monopoly belongs to the General Electric Co. and the Westinghouse Co.—these companies to share the business 60 and 40 per cent, respectively, and the Radio Corporation of America to be the sole selling agency. This monopoly has been further accentuated by the licensing of 25 hitherto independent manufacturers, giving the Radio Trust control of at least 75 per cent of the receiving set manufacture in the United States.

8. The monopoly of all radio vacuum tubes in the United States. This monopoly was to have been perfected through the famous "tube clause" in the license agreements issued by the Radio Corporation of America to the licensed set manufacturers requiring them to buy their tubes from the trust. The United States district court at Wilmington, Del., however, has declared that this clause violated the Clayton Act and has opened the way for millions of dollars' worth of triple damage suits by the independent tube manufacturers whom the trust had tried to destroy.

9. The monopoly of all future radio development in such vast fields as television, telephotography, distance actuation, radiant energy, and radio transmission of power. This monopoly is sought through the agreements for the future pooling of all research made by the companies in the trust, and the reciprocal allotment of exclusive fields for their exploitation.

Our organization represents the independent radio manufacturers whom this powerful monopoly has tried to destroy. Neither the independent manufacturer nor the independent broadcasting station nor the independent listener can fight this monopoly alone. He must have the help of the Congress of the United States. The restrictions which the two Houses of Congress are writing into the bill to extend the life of the Radio Commission are an important step toward curbing this monopoly. However, they do not go far enough. May we suggest, therefore, that the Senate investigate this radio monopoly in order that it may give permanent relief to the American people and keep the air free.

Sincerely yours,

OSWALD F. SCHUETTE,
Executive Secretary Radio Protective Association.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it has been suggested to me that if the Radio Commission shall discharge its duty as it should under the law, it will deny a license to this trust and to its subsidiaries. The law provides that licenses shall be granted only where the public interest requires or where it is a matter of necessity or convenience. Obviously there is no necessity for crowning the efforts of this trust with additional power or increasing its opportunities for further growth. Certainly it is not convenient for the public to grant this organization the important position it holds in the broadcasting field. Certainly it is not in the public interest to increase its monopolistic power.

Mr. President, unfortunately in our industrial and economic life the centripetal forces which we are experiencing in governmental activities are manifested. Power is being centralized in the Federal Government, and the centralizing forces in the industrial world are gathering into giant monopolies and organizations the capitalistic forces of the United States. The Radio Trust may become a menace, if it is not already so. The Department of Justice, if the trust violates the law, should institute proceedings against it. There should be competition in this industry, as there should be competition in all branches of our economic and industrial life. The bill before us does not, in my opinion, sufficiently protect the public, but I hope that those who shall finally be made commissioners will observe the law, and, on the ground of public interest, deny licenses to monopolies or organizations whose activities are not for the public welfare.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, before offering what I desire to insert in the RECORD, I may say in response to the statement of the Senator from Utah that the necessity for the pending legislation comes about not merely because of granting to the Radio Corporation and its affiliated corporations licenses, but in giving them the lion's share of the power stations of the country. That is the practice that has caused the great outcry in the country and has forced Congress to pass this legislation.

Mr. President, I want to correct, so far as I can, a statement that I made on the floor the other day, which I based upon the information that was given at the hearings. I was asked by some Senator—I think by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]—as to the practicability of broadcasting chain programs on one wave length.

I said that engineers appearing before the committee had said that that was impracticable and that it caused heterodyning and squeals. I referred to the fact that a station in Columbus, Ohio, WAIU, and a station in Detroit, Mich., WGHP, had tried this experiment and that it had been a failure. I based that statement on information given at the hearings. I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. H. V. Akerberg, chief engineer of radio station WAIU, at Columbus, under date of March 22, in which he sets out the fact regarding that experiment and incloses some 15 or 20 letters from listeners who heard the program without heterodyning and without interference. So, in order that my own statement, which was made in good faith, may be corrected as to those two stations and that experiment, I ask that this letter and the accompanying copies of letters may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letters referred to by the Senator from Washington will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

WAIU, COLUMBUS, OHIO, March 22, 1928.

HON. SENATOR DILL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: It has recently been brought to my attention that the synchronization experiments conducted between WAIU, the American Insurance Union, at Columbus, Ohio, and WGHP, at Detroit, Mich., during January last were discussed during the recent Washington hearing of the Committee on Interstate Commerce relative to the confirmation of radio commissioners' testimony read into the records include a statement by President Merlin Aylesworth, of the National Broadcasting Co., to the effect that their experiments were a failure. Might I invite your attention to the attached testimonials representing the concrete results of our experiment from the listeners' point of view.

May I point out that these experiments were conducted on an uncleared channel, that of 1,080 kilocycles, and if any heterodyning was in evidence it was due to the fact that there were other carriers on this frequency at the same time the experiment was conducted. There was no heterodyning evidenced between WAIU and WGHP. Had the experiment been conducted on a cleared channel it would have met with signal success. To demonstrate the practicability of the idea, it is my purpose to apply to the Federal Radio Commission for the privilege of conducting the experiment on a cleared channel, namely, 1,000 kilocycles, broadcasting a Columbia chain program simultaneously with KMOX, St. Louis, Mo.

I am sure these experiments will have a far-reaching effect and aid greatly in the solution of the problems now faced by the Radio Commission.

May I have the pleasure of your comment?

Very respectfully,

BROADCASTING STATION WAIU,
H. V. AKERBERG, Chief Engineer.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Your Columbia hour 10 to 11 p. m. Wednesday came in perfectly at Marion, Ohio. When I first tuned in I noticed you were off your usual wave length a little, and wondered why, but it was explained. Your synchronization with the Detroit station was entirely successful as far as my set was concerned.

R. BEEMAN, Marion, Ohio.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

So far as I could see, WAIU came in with its usual clarity and power. We were unable to get WGHP's announcements.

LEWIS K. COOK, Basil, Ohio.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Picking up the keynote to your announcement, wishing to hear from, in, and around Toledo, Ohio, interested me, Bowling Green, Ohio, being my boyhood home. Finding you were making a test of chain stations on same wave lengths, am pleased to advise the full hour was received perfectly, I would say, on a set, as my instrument is a 2-year-old set using same tubes as came with set.

Aside from some fading, the reception was perfect. According to my dialings, I picked you up on 270 meters. I note log gives your station as 5,000 watts and WGHP 1,500 watts. I perhaps do not understand, however, if reception came from different stations; change was not noticeable.

Trust the trial will prove successful, so chain stations may, as you say, broadcast on same wave, thereby clearing the air.

Yours very truly,

H. A. MATHEWS.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Congratulations for the fine, clear-cut synchronization radio broadcast test with WGHP, Detroit.

At no time were any signals heard that indicated any heterodyne. Every 7-second period absolutely quiet. The most prominent feature was your own broadcast on 1,080 kilocycles. There appeared to be some steadying force holding WAIU to the wave, giving it a tone quality and, hard to describe, goodness, dependability. At no time did WGHP signals come in. I am about 12 miles northwest of your WAIU transmitter station; listened in with a first-class 7-tube circuit, miles from any man-made interference.

Yours,

W. F. MARSH.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

In regard to the experiment conducted by your station to-night in conjunction with station WGHP, Detroit. The few minutes of the Kolster hour and the entire Columbia hour was received very splendidly and without interruption, interference, or heterodyning.

The receiver on which we heard your programs was the "Roberts 4-Tube Reflex," assembled by myself, and which has been in continuous service for three and one-half years.

During the first 10 or 12 minutes you were very hard to hold. Not that you were fading, but your frequency seemed to change, and I had to vary my radio-frequency dial from 1 to 1.5 degrees to keep in the center of your signal, and also to get maximum volume and to avoid distortion.

But weather conditions might have had something to do with this, because it was a rather poor night for reception. Most of the stations were fading, and there was more static than has been at any time this year on the majority of them; there was no fading on your station, and the static was very slight.

Wish to say, though, that we never heard WGHP announced and heard you identify your station every time but once.

Also wish to say that the Irving Berlin program was thoroughly enjoyed and hope everyone received it as successfuly as we did.

And I will be willing to cooperate with you and help in any way, and can on future test programs.

Yours respectfully,

EARL ALEXANDER,
Gordon, Wis., R. R. No. 1.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Reception of Columbia program this evening through your station was satisfactory to me. I notice no difference in reception.

Yours truly,

CHARLES H. SEGALE,
1103 Neil Avenue, Columbus, Ohio.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Picked up the broadcast program between WAIU and WGHP here at 9.20 p. m., eastern standard time. There was light whistle hardly noticeable. Signals were loud. Local QRM made signals rough. Bloopers and regenerative receivers around this neighborhood made it impossible to hear clearly one complete announcement or number. Did not hear WGHP make their announcement, although heard faint talking when their turn came to announce.

PH. GIMBLE,
4817 Forest Avenue, Norwood, Ohio.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

I received your program Wednesday night with WGHP on same wave, which was very satisfactory over Atwater-Kent, model 20, 5-tube receiver; had no interference, as before it was terrible. I don't think I will have to buy a Kolster set now.

Very truly yours,

WM. K. MEINER,
1143 Eighth Street, Loraine, Ohio.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

As one of your vast unseen audience I want you to know I thoroughly appreciated your fine program of this evening. A remarkable achievement, your joint program with Detroit.

Mr. and Mrs. LEROY DUNN,
715 Prospect Road, Des Moines, Iowa.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

I want to express my appreciation with this applause card of the program received from your station on January 18; the attempt to synchronize was a wonderful achievement. Your signals came through wonderfully loud and clear.

A. WEISSBERG,
1437 Shakespeare Avenue, New York, N. Y.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

I was interested in your test last night with WGHP, of Detroit, and as you asked for the radio fans' opinion on the reception I want to express my opinion. I have a Victoreen super I built myself, and want to say that at times the reception was fine and again at times the reception was "mushy," and at other times there was a heterodyne whistle, as if one station was off their wave length a little. I believe your idea would be a success if both stations used crystal control. I am of the opinion that the Federal Radio Commission will make crystal control compulsory for all stations in the very near future, and I believe this will eliminate a large per cent of the present heterodyning of stations near the same wave length. Wishing you all the success in your future experimental tests, I remain,

Yours truly,

FRANK E. MITCHELL,
182½ East Main Street, Newark, Ohio.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

This evening's test between WAIU and WGHP, of the Columbia chain, of 1,080 kilocycles proved a success as far as I am concerned. I was with WAIU all through the test. I am,

FRANK ADAMS,

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

You requested for reports of your test last night, January 18. I was tuned in for the last part of the Columbia phonograph hour from New York. The synchronization was perfect. There was no heterodyning at all. I enjoyed the program very much, very much more because there was no interference at all.

Yours truly,

DONALD ENDRES, Grove City, Ohio.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

In response to your test program, can say it came in fine, just as clear and plain as from WAJ and KNOX. We have a Kolster radio, six-tube table model, and can say they are the finest radio I have ever been privileged to listen over. Have had it a year last December, and have been out no expense except three new B batteries. I believe the Kolster radio is the best on the market. Have sold seven machines in our locality.

Yours truly,

MRS. ORAN SELLERS, Milan, Kans.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

I listened in on your test program with WGHP, and it came through fine without a heterodyne.

I have sold radios for the last three years and am very much interested in anything that will relieve the congestion of the air. There is not a station at the present time that one can depend on getting clear.

But I think this kind of a test ought to be made during the day, or real late at night, as the lower wave bands are so badly congested.

Yours very truly,

R. E. DEWEY, Sylvania, Ohio.

JANUARY 20, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

You were asking for reports on your reception of last Wednesday night. You signed off at 11.05 p. m. and your reception was fine; it came in just like New York station. I pick up your station and quite a few out there. I don't write much, but as you wanted to see how you were doing, I'll say the finest; you were hooked up on the experiment with two other stations. Now, the program came in fine, just as nice as New York.

CHARLES I. BELL,
No. 8 Engine Company, B. F. D., Bridgeport, Conn.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Your program came in very good and clear last evening while you were making your "synchronous test." I enjoy all of your programs, and announcer also. Would you kindly send me the book Listening. Thank you.

Mrs. F. O. CULLEY, Millersport, Ohio.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

The program came in fine here. We thank you for the test. Anything, any time, we can do for more and better radio let us know.

Most respectfully yours,

R. P. PETREE.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate your station on the splendid programs that you have been rendering to the people of Columbus and surrounding territory during the past few months.

Prior to the time of hooking up with the Columbian circuit I must confess that I did not pay a great deal of attention to your station, but now we are tuned in at all times when these programs are on.

Last evening the reception was very good and the programs were very fine, and you are certainly to be congratulated. I note that you were experimenting with a new hook-up with some Detroit station, but personally I could note no difference, and the reception was just as good as heretofore. I am using an eight-tube heterodyne unit.

Again thanking you, I remain,

Respectfully,

J. E. POWELL, Columbus, Ohio.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Reference to your broadcast Wednesday of the Berlin program with your station and WGHP, Detroit, on the same wave.

I listened to most of the program through WAIU; heard the program very good with no interference from WGHP. In fact, I did not know you were on the same frequency until your announcer closed the program.

I first had the program through KMOX at St. Louis, but being so close to our own station here on 5,000 watts I was getting some interference, dropped down the dial to WAIU, and heard the entire program clearly. You perhaps know that we only broadcast two hours of the Columbia chain on Sunday afternoons. The modulation of your station was very good, with only slight fading. From a BCL's opinion at this point your experiment was a success.

With best wishes,

NEWS DIRECTOR ANNOUNCER,
Station KOIL.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Commenting on radio reception of January 18—it was fine. We have an O. C. Dayton set, and think Mr. Thompson's voice the best by far as announcer; perfectly plain; we enjoy him very much.

Respectfully yours,

Mr. and Mrs. R. M. R. HUTCHINGS,
Mechanicsburg, Ohio.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

I am pleased to report that the synchronized program came in with remarkable clarity and volume. No trace of distortion was present. The volume was great, no doubt due to both stations contributing. No interference with Detroit or other station was present.

Very truly yours,

LAURENCE C. JONES, Liberty, Nebr.

JANUARY 19, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

Am pleased to report picking you up on my Victoreen super last evening at 8.45, and holding you on and off as desired until 10.

Everything came in splendidly, except interference from fading and from Denver if not careful in set adjustment.

Program was fine, and the Berlin program particularly so; music box also sounded nice and "tinkley." I also want to comment on the nice announcing—your "gentlemanly miker" is good, thoroughly alive to his responsibilities, and with the voice to put it over. "Pleased to meet yah."

Very truly yours,

FRED W. SYKES,
403 West Lake Street, Chicago, Ill.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

I have just finished listening in on your fine program. I have a two-tube Crosley, and got every word clear. Just before closing you spoke of a set you were checking up on. I have forgotten the name. Are these sets sold in Canada; if so, by what company? If not, would the music company you spoke of care to sell to a private? I have never heard of a set by the name you mentioned. If the sets are as good as yours, no doubt some could be sold in this district. Kindly let me hear from you.

Yours truly,

E. B. PUGH,
Digby County, Westport, Nova Scotia, Box No. 85.

JANUARY 18, 1928.

WAIU, Columbus, Ohio:

The simultaneous broadcasting between your station and Detroit came in here wonderful, perfect. We tuned in at about 9.40 p. m., C. S. T., not knowing what we may pick; but having the dial accidentally set, turned on the current and in came the music we like best, so we let it set. Then when you signed off at 10 p. m., C. S. T., we surely were surprised, and even before my wife made the remark about your station coming in so clear, without the slightest sign of fading, and after hearing the news we were surprised; and wish to state that I believe that the puzzle of fading is solved through this form of broadcasting. I am not green in radio, having built more than 100 sets, and tried out almost every known circuit for my own in the last eight years. I must say that this will be the coming way of broadcasting, and wish you the utmost success in your undertaking. We tune in for WAIU almost every Wednesday evening. Having lived in Bowling Green, Ohio, for a number of years and in Columbus for several months, about 20 years ago, I am always pleased to hear from the Buckeye State, especially over the radio.

Again wishing you success and thanking you for the wonderful programs we have so far received from WAIU and congratulating the artists, we wish to remain, as ever, one grateful listener and family.

Yours very truly,

ADOLPH THOUSAND,
Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has said and in view of the fact that an excuse advanced for large election slush funds is the cost of advertising, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if there is in this bill or in the law of last year or in any pending legislation any provision that seeks to control the possibility of large sums of money being expended by candidates in monopolizing the use of the radio to the disadvantage of those who are without financial means with which to advertise by means of radio broadcasting?

Mr. DILL. The only provision of the radio act of 1927 relating to the use of the radio by candidates for office is the provision that requires that a radio station owner who permits his station to be used by one candidate must give equal opportunity to any other candidate for that office. That was as far as Congress felt it wise to go when the law was passed a year ago. So far as I know there has been no abuse of the use of the radio in a political way in discriminating against candidates.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I recall that legislation, of course, but the Senator is aware of the fact that the usual rates for the use of radio are not maintained during political campaigns; that the radio companies have a special price for political use, a price that is double if not treble the usual price for advertising over the radio. The Senator is aware of that fact, is he not?

Mr. DILL. I am.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is no check upon such charges.

Mr. DILL. There is not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that it may be possible for any radio station to charge such an excessive sum that some candidates will be in position financially to use the radio, while others will not be.

Mr. DILL. That is a possibility. I may say, however, that the radio is still new and the commission has not been authorized to take over control of rates for advertising by radio; it has not been authorized to pass upon the question of advertising or the way in which it shall be handled. That may become necessary if radio stations abuse the freedom which has been allowed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In view of the Senator's special knowledge of this subject, I hope that before this session of Congress shall adjourn or when he shall return after his reelection to the next Congress, he will draft some proposed legislation which will aim to provide for the use of this powerful means of public information equitably to all candidates for public office and all political parties. I think that we ought not to wait until the abuses appear, which are certain to come and have already arrived in the matter of radio advertising, but that some constructive and remedial legislation ought to be enacted. Has the Senator given thought to the importance of this feature of radio regulation?

Mr. DILL. I may say to the Senator I have given much thought to that subject. In that connection I will give expression to a thought which I have not previously expressed, namely, that, since radio stations are given licenses by the Government to use certain frequencies in radio transmission, it might properly be required that a certain amount of time be permitted by candidates for office and in the discussion of public questions without cost to anybody. There is to-day no license fee charged. The use of a wave length is worth thousands and sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars to those who receive permission to use it. Wave lengths are given without cost other than the mere investment of money and the attempt to give programs that will be satisfactory. I have thought that legislation might well be framed that would require in consideration of the use of a wave length that a part of the time should be used for the discussion of public questions without cost, and that those representing all sides of a question should be given equal opportunity to use the radio.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Could not a condition be inserted in the licenses issued to radio stations that use for political purposes should be given to the public; that the public should be given the opportunity of receiving by radio from the candidates for public office full and complete political information, and that the Government itself should have the use of the radio for certain periods of time for furnishing public information?

Mr. DILL. Undoubtedly it could, and, I think, with perfect propriety, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Now, let me direct the Senator's attention to another matter.

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. When this measure was before the House I communicated with Commissioner Caldwell, and he stated to me at that time:

> Under this rearrangement a rough calculation shows that Massachusetts would have its present power of 19,000 watts cut to 3,750, and its 18 stations cut to 8 stations, in order to put New England on the same basis as certain States in the South which have very few radio stations and very few radio listeners.

I understood the purpose of the House amendment was to equalize radio power and radio stations. It seems to me that the real end and object to be attained is the equalization of radio service. While the number of stations and the amount of radio power are factors in determining the equalization of service, it seems to me that what the commission ought to try to work out is a plan that will give the people of all parts of the country an opportunity to listen to and receive the best radio programs and to have the very best of radio service. I judge from what the Senator has said that the compromised conference agreement that has been reached seeks to bring about that condition and that there is to be no immediate reduction in the number of stations or the amount of power in any of the radio zones, at least not until such time as applications are made and radio stations financed from the zones which have not the number of stations to which they are entitled. Is that correct?

Mr. DILL. Let me say to the Senator that the fact that Mr. Caldwell attempted to interpret a statute before it was written and to interpret it in the way he did shows how unfitted, in my judgment, he is to apply the new law of Congress to conditions that are to be changed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. His criticism was of the House amendment.

Mr. DILL. The Senate amendment will lead to practically the same result when it shall be applied. It assumes, first, that all of the zones must be cut down to the level of the lowest zone, the third zone, in the South, which has one-fifth of what the first zone has. It assumes, in the second place, that the present high-powered stations should be allowed to retain the superiority they now have.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The monopolizing of broadcasting by the high-powered stations the Senator from Washington and I do not agree to.

Mr. DILL. To which I do not agree. Let me remind the Senator from Massachusetts, however, that if the three or four high-powered stations in the first zone were cut to 10,000 watts, the first zone would then have only about 115,000 or 120,000 watts, which is less than some of the other zones have and one-half of its proportionate share. Instead of wiping out stations, instead of reducing power to the ridiculous point suggested in Mr. Caldwell's letter, all the commission has to do is to take away from the Radio Corporation and the General Electric Co. and affiliated stations the enormously high power granted them, and the first zone will not have beyond its proportionate share. But the statement made by Mr. Caldwell was based on the theory that the commission would continue to give these stations the proportionate superpower which they now have, and that, in my judgment, is the best proof that I have seen of his unfitness to carry out the new law.

The new law proposes to divide wave lengths and time of operation and station power as nearly equally as possible and lays down a principle of law, namely, that the equality of service shall be the basis for such division.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As it should be.

Mr. DILL. Then, in order that there can be no doubt as to what is meant by "equality of service," the law says that in order to bring about this equality of service they shall divide as nearly equally as possible wave lengths and station power and time of operation and frequencies. That does not mean that some zone that has a low number of licenses to-day can not have the number increased; it does not mean that they are to wipe out any other stations; but it does mean that there must be some justice and some equality of treatment to different sections of the country and to different applicants who apply for these licenses.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In other words, no radio station destructive policy is contemplated immediately?

Mr. DILL. No destructive policy is contemplated, and no fair-minded commissioner can read into the law a destructive policy.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator if he can give us any information as to why these three high-powered stations have not had their power reduced ere this?

Mr. DILL. The only reason I know is that the commission has not reduced them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Are they the source of all this trouble? And this legislation would not be here if it were not for them?

Mr. DILL. This legislation would not be here if it had not been for the excessive power granted to a few big stations, and then the fact that it had been granted to them was used as a reason for not granting power and licenses to other sections of the country.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So we are up against the old problem of the big monopolies gradually, through governmental aid and commissions, as the Senator from Utah indicated in his remarks, eliminating the smaller stations and the smaller operators.

Mr. DILL. I want to say that I do not, of course, agree with everything the Senator from Utah said. I have no desire to see anybody shut off the air so long as it is used properly. I want the Radio Corporation and the Westinghouse Co. and the General Electric Co. to have the right to broadcast their programs for the people of this country; but I do not want, and I do not think the Congress wants, and I know the intent of this law is not, to have them permitted to crowd off the air a great number of independent and smaller stations. If that kind of an interpretation is persisted in, there are two remedies—one in the courts and the other by impeachment and conviction of commissioners.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think there is a good deal in the fear of monopoly control expressed by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. DILL. I think there is, too; but most of the troubles of which the Senator from Utah complains must be reached by other kinds of legislation than by dividing wave lengths, licenses, and power.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am appreciative of the Senator's explanation in answer to my questions.

Mr. DILL. I am very glad to answer them.

I shall not take more time now unless there are some other questions.

Mr. DILL subsequently said: Mr. President, I have here some charts that I should like to insert in the RECORD at the end of my remarks made earlier in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to enlist the attention of the Senate to what I regard as the greatest question now before the American Congress. I hope I can make my remarks brief, and possibly to the point.

Nearly a year has passed since the waters gathering in the great Mississippi Valley swept in their devastating course to the Gulf, with a resultant loss of life of nearly a thousand persons, with a probable loss through exposure of a much larger number. There was a direct loss in property of $250,000,000, and, again, that loss does not comprehend the incidental damage which fell upon the country. It will require years to restore the conditions as they once existed.

That flood was perhaps the worst flood since the country has been thoroughly settled, but there is not a year when the waters do not break beyond their banks at some place, and when vast damage is not done to the great Mississippi Valley.

The direct damage is only a small part of the actual damage resulting, for lying adjacent to the Mississippi and its vast tributaries are enormous bodies of land, which, if they are not overflowed every year, nevertheless are not regarded as entirely safe for agricultural purposes, and agriculture languishes and suffers by reason of the constant menace existing. I think it is safe to say that there is an annual average loss, by virtue of the conditions I have mentioned, and many other conditions which exist, and which I do not pause now to detail, of $250,000,000; that four years of these losses will aggregate a billion dollars.

The question is, What is to be done with this sort of condition, and incidental to that, and as important, is the question, What are the causes for the condition? I do not intend to go into that question in detail; I merely mention the fact that nearly every farm that has been improved in the great valley has resulted in the building of ditches and drains carrying into the stream in a few hours' time the water that formerly accumulated and lay on the ground for a period of time, and then slowly worked its way to the body of the stream. Myriads of these ditches have been built. Myriads of tile drains have been laid. The result is that the water that accumulated, and that formerly took 30 or 60 days to reach the body of the stream, is now hurled there within a few hours, or a few days, time.

Going along with these lesser improvements has been a general movement for the drainage of immense areas that formerly constituted great spaces where overflowed water could be held and was held for long periods of time. That land has been reclaimed for agriculture. Thriving villages, towns, and cities have been built thereon. Millions of people have invested their money, and an immense amount of value has been added to the wealth of the Nation.

In general and in a word, these improvements, all necessary to the development of our country, have created a condition whereby the natural reservoirs which formerly existed have been wiped out, the slow and gradual seepage of waters into the streams has been supplanted by a system that sends the waters into the streams in a very short space of time. These conditions exist from the Gulf of Mexico to the source of the river, and then, extending along the tributaries, reach far into the interior, until finally they touch the base of the mountains on either side of the great interior valley.

It must be manifest, therefore, that the problem is one not for communities, not for States, but for the Nation to control. The States nearer the source of the stream, or the individuals of the States, have adopted improvements resulting in the conditions I have spoken of, hurling waters into the stream at that point. The water goes on to injure or menace every State to the Gulf. Cooperation between the States can not be expected, because their interests are entirely different. States further upstream are not menaced, and yet they furnish the waters which cause the menace.

As we proceed down the stream, as the Mississippi gathers the waters of all its great network of tributaries, the menace increases, until we find in the lower Mississippi a raging torrent, which words can not describe, and which nothing but the highest engineering talent of the world can ever control. If we consider the case of Louisiana and of other States near the mouth of the river, we find that there the greatest menace exists from the parent stream.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, then, from the Senator's remarks, one can not escape the conclusion that this question is distinctly a national question in every sense of the word.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is what I am trying to lead up to. Louisiana is helpless. Why? Even if it had all the money in the world at its command, it could not control the river outside its boundaries or beyond its borders. It can not control these waters further upstream which come hurtling down upon it. What is true of that State is true of the other States lying near the mouth of the river.

Another consideration is that no State can interfere at all with this stream except by the permission of the Federal Government. The problem, therefore, is a problem that can be handled only by the Federal Government, and the Federal Government has been derelict in its duty to an astonishing degree and over a great period of time.

It began years ago, when perhaps there might have been some excuse, because the Government was poor and limited in its means, a system of patchwork improvement. It built a little dike here, a little revetment there, and a little bit more at some other place. No systematic scheme has ever been adopted in all the long years for really solving this problem.

Fifty years ago we began to improve the Ohio River for navigation. For 50 years we have been building a series of dams which are of no practical benefit until the last one of the dams is built and we still have three or four dams to build.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 1271, the migratory bird bill.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That sort of thing in the construction of dams illustrates the conduct of the Government with reference to the entire problem. Moreover, the Government has followed the policy of limiting its work to navigation and improvements incident thereto. It has utterly ignored the greater problem and the greater duty of controlling the flood waters and protecting the adjacent lands and property from injury, a policy which has always seemed to me to be narrow and stupid to the last degree. This is not a new thought with me. The RECORD will show that I have time and again in the Senate for a period of years declared that as the Government asserted its jurisdiction over these streams, it was for that reason alone in duty bound to harness and control the waters over which it asserted its dominance.

We have been met always—and, so far as I know, by all administrations—with opposition to that view. Apparently, it took the lesson of this frightful catastrophe to finally awaken a real interest and a real understanding of the magnitude of the question involved. But it has been a slow process; and while conviction seems to be gradually settling into the minds of the statesmen who control at the present time, the conversion does not seem to be complete and certain. With all the waters rushing to the sea, with human beings clinging to the branches of trees, with the homes of people tossed upon the surface of the angry waves, with men, women, and children fleeing for their lives, with hunger and want standing with their grinning skeleton countenances looking at the horrible spectacle, we could not arouse the Government to any effective action.

Some of us asked for a special session of Congress to appropriate money to alleviate the distress. I myself sent a telegraphic request to every Member of Congress asking them to appeal to the President to call an extra session of Congress. The President was engaged in the laborious and exacting duty of learning how to bait with worms hooks for trout. He sent Mr. Hoover down the stream, and Mr. Hoover and others recommended that the problem be handled by public charity. The Red Cross, one of the most magnificent organizations there is on this earth, was called in to furnish the moneys which ought to have been furnished by the Federal Government, and furnished within a few days' time. The hat was passed, and charitable people all over the land contributed. A wholly inadequate fund was secured. It was put before these people as a charity, as a dole. Many thousands of them refused to accept it, even though they were suffering for food. It was a policy of economy, and the kind of economy which in my judgment is the most unjustifiable and contemptible it is possible for the human mind to conceive. It is a strange kind of economy. It is an economy that seems to be limited to our own country and to our own people, but which does not apply to the people of foreign lands.

There have been other disasters in other parts of the world. We have made appropriations elsewhere. Our hearts ache when we hear a cry of distress if it comes from across the sea. But if it is at home, and the message is borne to us in the English language, we pass the hat. I am not going to undertake at all to give a complete list, but here are a few:

In December, 1921, we appropriated $20,000,000 for the relief of the distressed people of Russia, which was a perfectly justifiable thing, for whenever people starve and we have plenty we can afford to send them aid. But that really ought to apply in this country as well as elsewhere.

In January, 1922, we sent Russia $4,000,000 worth of medical supplies. In March, 1924, we sent medical supplies for the earthquake sufferers of Japan. In February, 1925, we appropriated over $6,000,000 of supplies to relieve the sufferers from the earthquake in Japan. On March 4, 1925, we appropriated $10,000 of quartermaster supplies, and in this case it went to New Bern, N. C., the smallness of the amount indicating, of course, that it was going to the American people. We appropriated $100,000,000 for the relief of Europe after the war.

All of these benefactions I approve. But I inquire now why it was that Congress was not convened and the great arm of this Government stretched out to protect people who were in no wise to blame for their condition, people who were suffering largely because of the acts of the Government itself, for it is now a conceded fact that in seeking to improve the Mississippi River the Government engineers closed certain great outlets for flood waters and by that act increased the menace of the flood.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I should make just a brief statement?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. In reference to the calling of an extra session, I want to say at this time that a great majority of the Senators, irrespective of party, united in the request, with those of us who live in the valley, asking the President to call an extra session for the relief of the flood sufferers.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I thank the Senator. I know that to be a fact from my own personal communication with them also. But, Mr. President, that is past. That is history. Fortunes have been wiped out, homes have been destroyed, families have been broken up, vast areas have been devastated. The relief did not come when it was needed, but they were promised that in the future we were going to take care of the river proper.

Patriotic men from all over the South and some from other parts of the Nation came immediately to Washington and sought to have, through conferences, a measure worked out which would be of benefit for the future. Some of them have spent months of time here. The first thing that they encountered was the proposition that this work was to be continued on a small scale—that is, a small scale as I see the question—and then that the work could not proceed unless and until there should be a contribution of 20 per cent from the States or local communities.

That 20 per cent was to be largely paid by people who had been bankrupted, by communities that had been prostrated, by men and women who had already, in fighting former floods, for the construction of levees, and other works of protection, mortgaged their lands through the issuance of bonds and various other securities that rested as a burden upon their properties.

Moreover, such a plan as that would simply have meant that this work would not be completed for many, many years. Any one State by refusing to make its contribution might delay or prevent the improvement of the stream at a point where if it were not improved the works below and even the works above could not be constructed and be effective. If that plan of the administration had gone through, I venture to say that there is not a man living to-day who would have ever seen it completed. It was without justice; it was impractical; it was indefensible.

My understanding is that it has been agreed that provision shall go out of the bill; that that result has been accomplished by patriotic men who assembled here; that they had very effective assistance in the House of Representatives from Representative FRANK R. REID, chairman of the House Flood Control Committee, and assistance from many others. A number of Senators also have worked upon it. I am very proud also to say that my colleague, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], has given nearly all of his time since this session began to the accomplishment of the result just named and to other improvements in the bill, to which I shall refer briefly later on. So we now have a bill, which I do not claim is perfect in any of its parts, but which seems to be reasonably acceptable to those who have given this great problem much time and study. That amendments to it will be offered I have no doubt.

It was proposed to appropriate a sum of money about one-fourth of what it will take to do the work. It seems to be conceded that it will take at least $700,000,000 to do the job and to do it right. It was then proposed to appropriate, I believe, $225,000,000 or $268,000,000.

Mr. HAWES. It was proposed to appropriate $268,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. To authorize the appropriation of that sum.

Mr. REED of Missouri. To authorize, I mean, not to appropriate. That sum has been raised to $325,000,000, which is just about one-half of the money that everyone agrees must be expended and, in my judgment, just about one-third of what will ultimately have to be expended if the work shall be completed properly. However, that much has been accomplished, and the work can be started. That much of an enlargement of the bill has been brought about by these proposed amendments.

It was also proposed to leave the work entirely in the hands of the Army engineers; that is to say, in the last analysis, they were to decide everything. That provision has been enlarged so that civil engineers are to be added and the authority of the Mississippi River Commission enlarged—a vast improvement. I shall not stop now to mention the other matters, because what I have spoken of lies within the scope of the remarks I want to make.

In the first place, I do not want to criticize our Army engineers with any harshness, but I propose to state some limitations for which they are not responsible. I have seen them at their work; I have heard them before committees; and I assert that they always work under restrictions. They have an intimation from some committees of Congress or from the President that an appropriation must be kept at a certain figure, and they make their plans thereafter not according to what should be done in order to meet the problem but what they can do within the limits that have been set.

I recall—and I mention it merely in illustration—the instance of an Army engineer who said they could only expend a million dollars that year, although there was the necessity for the expenditure of several times that amount. When he was asked why they could not expend it, why they could not begin work at 20 places, he said they had no equipment; that the amount stated was all that they could expend with their equipment. Then, when he was asked why they did not get more equipment, he said that Congress did not make the appropriations continuous, and that the engineers did not feel authorized to spend the money; in other words, in a case that required the labor of 20, and with 20 men available, they only employed 1 because they had only one shovel. So we have proceeded through the years.

Moreover, there is another difficulty. We rarely keep an Army engineer in the position of the head of the Engineering Corps, the Chief of Engineers, for but a few years. Largely, these men work up from subordinate positions where they have had little opportunity really to employ their talents and employ them without limitations. An officer holds the position of Chief of Engineers for a few months in many instances, and for a few years in other cases. This problem, sirs, is not of the character that it ought to be consigned to the control of men thus circumscribed and hampered.

I should like, in the few minutes more I intend to occupy the floor, to give, if I can, my conception of what this problem is. First, it is national in scope and must be handled by the National Government if it is ever handled effectively. Second, the problem embraces and affects, either directly or indirectly, the welfare of substantially all of the territory lying between the foothills of the Rockies and the Alleghenies. Third, it affects the welfare of forty or fifty millions of the population of the United States in a direct manner, and it affects the entire country indirectly, because whatsoever affects so large a portion of the country must have its reflex action upon all parts of the country.

Fourth. There is not a business man in the world, if he owned the United States with all of its wealth, its resources, and its possibilities, who would allow these devastating waters to continue their destruction for a single moment beyond the time when the employment of the highest talent of the world could stop their destruction. As a cold business proposition he would garner these waters in the mountain passes and in the valleys and there begin the employment of them to irrigate the dry lands of the West, and turn vast portions of that section into the most beautiful agricultural and horticultural lands of the world.

The expenditure there would be in proportion to the task. It would be in proportion to the demand. The waters thus held back would in a slight measure—I think only in a slight measure—affect the flood waters below. As he proceeded it would be found necessary at various places to construct dams, and in the construction of dams and reservoirs power would be necessarily developed; and with that power thus developed he would furnish all those things that power can give, and he would obtain it or furnish it to himself at actual cost.

Fifth. As he proceeded down this stream he would not proceed with temporary construction, neither would he begin at one point on the stream, but he would begin at as many points as men and machinery could occupy; and the works when constructed would be permanent works, would stand there through the ages; and when he had completed his task he would have made fertile fields out of great deserts. He would have made the finest agricultural lands out of areas that are now swamps or are overflowed; and the territory thus reclaimed would be greater than the thirteen original States of the Union. I am speaking not only of the Mississippi but of its tributaries. He would follow these tributary streams and give them the same kind of treatment as the parent stream; and when he had completed his work he would have added to the wealth of his investment or his ownership ten times the cost, and he would do it as a cold business proposition. This is not a cold business proposition alone; it is a question of humanity, of justice, and of right. The people have a right to demand this relief.

Mr. President, when we talk of the expenditure of a billion dollars to do a work such as I am speaking of, I ask Senators and the people to bear in mind the character of that expenditure. If a man buys an automobile to ride around in, and which he can get along without, that may be termed an expenditure. If a merchant engaged in business buys a truck which enables him to dispose of several teams of horses and haul his goods cheaper, that is an investment. When he makes that investment, he does not expend money at all; he increases his capital by changing its form. An improvement in this country which will give a vast body of land to agriculture, which will save the destruction of property, is like putting a roof upon a house. Though you borrow the money to put the roof on, you thereby save the house; and the borrowing of the money and its expenditure is not false economy. It is not waste. It is the truest kind of economy.

So, Mr. President, the disappointment I find is that this project, even as now improved, is entirely too narrow in its scope. The amount of money contemplated to be used is entirely inadequate. I wish that some day we could have some one in public life who could see the United States through something besides a knot hole, who could visualize this mighty land as it lies before us, and could recognize the fact that whatsoever improves a great proportion of it is of incalculable value, and that the expenditure of money that brings back returns is justifiable from every standpoint.

I never thought much of the economy of a man who let his plow lie in the winter snows and rust because he wanted to economize in building a shed in which to keep it. I never thought much of the economy of a man who allowed the roof on his house to become leaky, and hence had the entire house destroyed. I never thought much of the economy of a man who, having a hundred acres of ground to till, and only one horse, contented himself with tilling 10 acres instead of buying an additional horse or two. I never thought much of the economy of a man who starved his wife or his children, and thereby decreased their productive capacity; and that is entirely aside from the human phases of the question. I do not think much of the proposition of a government confronted by one of the greatest catastrophes in history which proposes inadequate remedies and halting policies.

If we were to enter upon this scheme as broadly as it should be, and it took a billion dollars to complete it, what would it cost us annually? Figures have been prepared—some of them were used by my colleague Mr. HAWES—to show that for the first 10 years the interest charge at 4 per cent would be only $22,000,000 annually. That is on the basis of a 4 per cent bond. I say that you can float the 50-year bonds of the United States to-day, tax free, at 3 per cent, and sell them as fast as people can get to the counter to buy them. At 3 per cent, the annual cost for the first 10 years would be only sixteen million and odd dollars. The average cost for the 50 years, with provisions for the retirement of the bonds at 4 per cent, would be $40,000,000—I omit all the odd figures—but at 3 per cent $30,000,000, vastly less than we now appropriate for repairs and patchwork improvements.

Are we frightened at it? Sometimes we get frightened very easily. Sometimes we are full of courage. When gentlemen found it convenient to do so, at the demand of international financiers, they could cut down the debts that the foreign nations owed us by over seven thousand millions of dollars. They could cut down the Italian debt alone by over $1,600,000,000.

Seven times the amount necessary to do this work on the largest scale has been taken from the debts that foreign nations owe us, and that they solemnly and in writing agreed to pay us; and the balance that we get of what they owe is distributed over a period of from 62 to 68 years. But when you turn to your own country, to your own people, to the greatest problem that ever confronted this Nation in time of peace, you find this caviling and haggling, these narrow views expressed.

Sir, I am in favor of entering upon this project under the best conditions we can to-day, and accepting this bill with some amendments that will probably be offered from the floor to meet certain difficulties; but in accepting it I do so with the protest that the plan is entirely inadequate. The hope that we have is that it may be enlarged as time goes on.

I am in favor of paying for this work out of bonds. The work is to last through a long period of time. Its benefits will be enjoyed by generations that are yet to come, if it is done right. Why not reduce the taxes upon the living, let them bear their proportion of this interest during the time they are living, and relieve us of some of the burdens that now exist? For taxation in this country to-day is one of the great curses of the country. Why shall we be told that we can not reduce taxes, and have the specter of this work held up before us as one of the reasons? Why should we not provide for the payment by the issuance of bonds which, I repeat, the American people will buy as fast as they are offered, and they will buy them at 3 per cent?

Mr. President, I know how anxious the people, particularly of the lower valley, are for this work. I know the menace they are under. I know that there is not an hour of the day or night when the specter of a possible danger does not hang over them.

It depreciates the value of their property, it interferes with their happiness. Relief ought to be immediate. Hence I am going to do nothing to delay this bill in the hope of imposing any views I may have.

The emergency must be met. Next summer may bring a repetition of last summer's flood. The next time it may sweep aside other levees, and great cities may be engulfed. We have been here a year since the flood. I criticize no one in the Congress for the delay. I criticize no one particularly for it. Certainly the time has come for action. Even though the bill, in my judgment, fails utterly to measure up to the magnitude of the problem, I shall not delay it an instant by offering any suggestions I have to make. I hope that when it is passed the people of the great valley will begin to feel that rescue is coming, and that before many months shall pass the great dangers will be forfended against.

I would like to see this bill pressed to its immediate passage, because there is always danger of trouble arising between the two Houses, or in either House, and delay is an extremely dangerous thing. We know that this year there will be a great desire to adjourn Congress by about the 1st of June, if not earlier. So, thanking the Senators who have given me their attention, I conclude by urging that every other measure be set aside until this great question can be disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply desire to make some observations along the lines of those of the Senator who has just surrendered the floor, and if the Senator from Indiana will pardon me I will take only a few minutes. My remarks will be in connection with the argument of the Senator from Missouri, and I would like them to follow his remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I can only say to the Senator, to whom I would like to yield, that I was under the impression that the Senator from Missouri would speak for 15 minutes, and I have been delayed now more than an hour past the time I expected to speak. If the Senator can assure me that he will take only a few minutes, I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall take only a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have been not only interested, but I have been delighted to hear the observations of the very able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in behalf of the consummation of this great undertaking as speedily as possible, more particularly in favor of the financing of this wonderful scheme by the process of issuing long-term bonds.

When this matter was first presented to the Committee on Commerce, of which I am a member, we had before us the proposition of General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, which dealt with only a portion of the problem, and estimated the cost at something like $300,000,000. We also had the proposition of the Mississippi River Commission, which dealt with the whole proposition in a broad and comprehensive way and estimated the cost at something like $700,000,000.

Shortly after we began the consideration of the problem it was intimated that the powers that be would not tolerate undertaking this project upon as broad a scale as that outlined in the proposition of the Mississippi River Commission. I then took occasion to state my position to the committee, and that position was this: That the sentiment of the country had crystallized upon the proposition that it was the duty of the Nation to take charge of this great system of waterways, and to safeguard it for all time to come from the possibility of such a disaster as took place in 1927, and that I thought that our legislation should provide against a flood not only as great as that of 1927, but at least 25 per cent greater.

I said I recognized that the cost would be enormous; that I believed the people of the United States were ready to assume the burden, but that the exigencies of the present situation were such that it would be almost cruel to require the people of this country to pay that enormous sum of money during the short period of time which would be necessary in order to complete the work under the plan of appropriating annual appropriations from current revenues to cover the work as it progressed.

I said that I was therefore in favor of treating this proposition as a great national investment, imposed upon us, not by any fault of man but imposed upon us by the forces of nature, and that I believed that it should be undertaken, not in part but as a whole, and should be completed as a whole, and that the entire indebtedness should be liquidated by the issuance of long-term bonds, to the end that this generation should not be required to pay the whole expense, and should not be required to do it for the reason that what was now proposed was permanent flood control, a control not for a decade or a quarter of a century but a protective system provided for all the years to come, and that future generations therefore should be required to bear a part of the burden.

I said that I therefore was in favor of that solution of the problem, not only because it seemed to me to be a wise financial arrangement for the Government to adopt in the execution of such a large and ambitious project but because at this particular time more than at any other time in all the history of this Government the people of this country are bearing a load of taxation that is not only burdensome but oppressive. In many instances it amounts almost to confiscation. I do not now refer altogether to the high Federal taxes. I refer more particularly to the high amount of taxation imposed upon the people by their States and their local subdivisions, not by way of extravagance but for the purpose of providing absolutely necessary facilities in order to give this generation the opportunity to take advantage of the discoveries and developments which have brought about new and unthought-of conditions in modern life.

An emergency has been created in the matter of taxation such as has never existed in America before, and while that emergency exists on the part of the States, forcing counties very frequently to impose upon their taxpayers a burden that consumes almost the entire profits of their operations, especially upon the farm population, in that condition to insist that we should bear all this burden within the next six or seven years, paying for this great project out of current funds would be, in my judgment, outrageous.

This generation is bearing an enormous burden of taxation already cast upon us as a result of the war and modern conditions, such a burden as never has been borne by a people before on this continent. This mighty undertaking of flood control will, of course, impose another very heavy burden, a burden that might result in forcing the curtailment of necessary river and harbor improvements and facilities in other parts of the country, as well as imposing an unjust and undue and an unnecessary burden upon the American taxpayer. I have repeatedly made this statement in the committee, insisting on financing flood control as one great project by a special issue of bonds just as we did the case of the construction of the Panama Canal.

We were confronted, however, with the dictum of the powers that be, that we must confine this bill to a section of this great water system, and the committee has decided to do that. According to the estimate before the committee, this piecemeal business will cost $325,000,000. The balance of the project, which is left open for the future, will cost probably as much as that sum, if not more, making an ultimate burden of something like $700,000,000.

I agreed to support this bill, not because I am satisfied with it, I want to say to the Senator from Missouri. I think we ought to meet this proposition boldly and courageously, and ought to settle it now and forever. But I was not able to have my way about it. It was my purpose, if we had had our way, to present an amendment to this bill providing for the cost by the issuance of bonds, but I decided, when it was concluded to separate and divide it into parts, that I would wait until action was taken, and then I would introduce a measure to provide a bond issue to pay for that part, and later, when the second portion of it was taken up, that I would introduce an amendment to the law, or a separate measure, providing for the payment for that by the further issuance of bonds.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I hope the Senator has not drawn the inference that anything I have said has been a criticism of him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know the Senator has not criticized me. I did not mean that. I am simply agreeing with the Senator.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I know the Senator has put his splendid ability and his great experience back of a proper measure, and I want to commend him for it. I had in mind just the kind of obstruction to which the Senator has referred. It has not been chargeable to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not think any member of the committee will say that, because I have been very persistent in insisting that this should be treated as one single proposition and the cost provided for through bonds instead of through annual levies of taxes upon the people.

Mr. President, I happened to be in Congress and a Member of the Senate when the Panama Canal bill was passed. I was then a member of the Commerce Committee, as I am to-day. My recollection is that at that time we passed a bill, as we are likely to do now, without providing any method for the payment of the cost of construction, probably intending at the time it was passed that we would appropriate for it as the engineers might call for it, as we do in the case of ordinary river and harbor improvements. But when it was ascertained that if the canal was constructed upon the plans prescribed in the legislation, the costs would run up into the hundreds of millions of dollars and that the burden, although not so great as in this case, would be more than the people of the country could well be called upon to stand, and after the bill had been passed providing for the building of the canal, a bill was introduced by former Senator Spooner, one of the greatest Senators that has sat in this body since I have been a Member of it, providing that the costs of that great enterprise, said then to be an enterprise so gigantic in its financial proportions that America was the only country in the world that could hope to carry it to a successful conclusion, should be borne by the issuance of long-term bonds. I do not think we provided for the issuance of the whole amount of bonds at one time, but a subsequent act was passed providing for a further issue so that the Panama Canal was financed upon the basis of bonds issued and that was upon the theory—and a theory the logic and ethics of which can not be contested—that one generation should not be required to bear the entire burden of a great governmental improvement and investment which was to be constructed for the benefit of future generations.

Mr. President, when we built the Panama Canal there were no such conditions in the country as there are to-day. When the war was on there was an emergency condition so far as the Federal Government was concerned, and to meet that emergency we called into existence every source of income that the Government could lay its hands upon. We wrung out of the people $8,000,000,000 in one year. We raised that sum by taxation in one year. To-day, although the war is long since over, we are paying on account of the great amount of indebtedness incurred during the war. Up to this time, almost 10 years after the war, we are still paying over a billion dollars a year on account of the war.

It will be some time before we get rid of this burden under the present system of a sinking-fund arrangement and the payment of annual interest. It will probably be 25 years before we get rid of this burden unless we collect out of the people money to pay interest and to pay the sinking fund in excess of the amount which the Congress of the United States in its wisdom has said ought to be paid, and thereby force a liquidation of this bonded indebtedness years before the time provided for its liquidation. That is what the administration has been attempting to do. That is what it wants to do now. That is the reason why it is not willing that we should reduce Federal taxes as much as they ought to be reduced, because the great financial interests, especially the international bankers, are anxious to get this great public debt retired in order that they may have the field to themselves. Therefore the people are being taxed beyond what was contemplated by the Congress, beyond what is written in the law as the policy of the Government in the retirement of the national debt. They are being taxed in order to give an advantage to certain great interests and monopolies in the United States.

Mr. President, the same emergency conditions that the Government has been confronting exist to-day in all the States of the Union. They exist in my State where we have levied taxes for the purposes of a great road construction program, where we are building added facilities for better education of our children, where we have had to repave our streets and install waterworks and lighting systems and sewerage systems and all that sort of thing.

In order to take advantage of the facilities and conveniences that new inventions and progress and civilization have put at our doors, we are burdened down with taxes. As I said a little while ago, in some jurisdictions this tax has become so high that the man who owns land and cultivates it for a living finds it exceedingly difficult to make enough net income to pay the taxes on his property.

In that condition of our country, when we are struggling with these great questions that modern civilization thrusts upon us, when we are trying to build these necessary conveniences and to pay off the obligations which we necessarily have assumed in connection with them, for the Federal Government to load us down with $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 to be paid in five or six years for a permanent improvement that ought to be so permanent in its nature and so solid in its character that it will stand for ages and for generations and our children and our grandchildren and our descendents for hundreds of years will get the same benefits from it that we get, and then to insist that we should pay it all in addition to the very heavy war burdens we have just had to bear and a part of which we are still bearing, to me is a cruel proposition. It is a proposition, Mr. President, not only cruel in its character, but one that may involve an annual expenditure which may result in an undue curtailment of the amounts that are necessary to add such improvements as modern conditions may require with reference to the other waterways and harbors of the country.

As I said to the committee, if it be insisted that this great sum shall be annually paid for this one system of waterways, then we are in danger of encountering sooner or later opposition from those sections of the Union who find themselves short of funds by reason of the immensity of the amount that will have to be paid annually from current revenues for this one enterprise.

Mr. President, I had not intended to take so much time. I ought to say in conclusion that while I did not have my way in the committee, although I insisted upon it almost continuously until the last few days of our session, which have been very prolonged, I shall not offer any amendment to the bill with reference to bonds. I shall try to facilitate the passage of the bill through the Senate as soon as possible. I shall not offer any opposition to it, although it is only doing the work by piecemeal, a dangerous policy, in my judgment, as well as an unwise one. I shall try to do what I can to facilitate its passage.

But if some other Senator does not do it first, I shall offer a bill later providing that the payment of such amounts as are annually needed for the construction of such part of the project as is contained in the pending bill, and may be adopted by Congress, shall be provided for by long-term bonds bearing a low rate of interest, to the end that we may cast a part of this burden, and justly cast it, upon those who are to come after us, and so that the present generation, which has been so overburdened with taxation that in some sections the very commercial life of the community is threatened and its prosperity imperiled, shall not have this further burden to carry unnecessarily.

OIL SCANDALS AND CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the hour is growing late and I shall not attempt to detain the Senate this afternoon for any length of time in a discussion of the subject that was announced by me some days ago. Instead I shall give notice now that on next Monday, or as soon thereafter as I can claim the floor in my own right, I shall again speak on the subject of Teapot Dome and the oil scandals.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the Senate's time should be taken up in political discussion; I do not believe the people of the United States like to have the Senate's time, with the enormous expense involved, taken up in the discussion of politics when there are tremendous problems here to be solved; and in the nearly two years and a half I have had the honor to be a Member of this body I have consumed very little time in political discussions; but the time has come when some one should stand up for the Republican Party, which I love, and which has very largely made this country the greatest the world has ever seen.

Mr. President, the Republican Party throughout the Nation is composed of honorable, patriotic, God-fearing American citizens; and I am willing to concede as much for the membership of the Democratic Party; but some of those who have been intrusted with leadership in both parties are mixed up in oil scandals. The rank and file of neither party is to blame. I shall never assail the rank and file of the Democratic Party. They have a right to their views as much as I have to mine. I shall never assail a single sovereign State while I am a Member of this body. I love them all, from the largest to the smallest. Each of them is a part of our common heritage and our common country.

Oil will not be an issue in the campaign next November. Teapot Dome will not be an issue in the campaign next November. The American people, members of both parties, will object to having their country's misfortune made a football of politics because some leaders in both parties, perchance, have erred in judgment and in some cases have betrayed the Nation. Men do not make issues, although issues sometimes make men; issues makes themselves, and the issues of the coming campaign will make themselves.

During the few minutes that I propose to discuss the origin of our troubles around Teapot Dome and Elk Hills, reserving the right to discuss these subjects in detail early next week, I shall only take passing notice of the Governor of New York. I shall say little at this moment about former Racing Commissioner Sinclair of New York.

I made a perfectly innocent inquiry a few days ago with reference to the Governor of New York and his administration. I would not discuss the Governor of New York at all were it not for the fact that he has to some degree made himself an issue before the people in that he aspires to the highest office in the land; he would be the Chief Executive of the Nation. A few days ago, within some 24 or 48 hours from the time the discussion took place on this floor in a running debate in which his name was used, after he had had time to form a deliberate judgment, he wrote to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] that amazing letter which in some situations might be considered a state paper. I say that anyone who would write a letter of that kind as his deliberate judgment, after due reflection, if placed in the White House might, in a very short time, embroil us with nations with which we are at peace. The people of this country do not want war with any other country; they desire peace. A man of his temperament would not be safe to guide the destinies of the Nation, if we may judge from the letter which was written.

Mr. President, I want to read now a few lines from that letter. I quote:

A careful search of the official records, made at my request to-day, confirmed my recollection that Mr. Sinclair never contributed to my campaign fund either in 1920 or any other time that I ever ran for office.

But, Mr. President, the ink had hardly dried after he had made his "careful investigation" until either he or the newspaper men or some one else dug up the fact that Sinclair did contribute to the New York committee known as the Tammany Society—and the country understands Tammany, and the country understands the relationship, I think, between the Governor of New York and Tammany in 1918. Another contribution, according to the news reports, was made by former Racing Commissioner Sinclair to the Democratic county committee of New York—Tammany—in 1926. Yet the governor rushes into print—giving his letter to the press before it was received by him to whom it was addressed—saying that a "careful investigation" failed to show any contribution from Sinclair. If the governor had waited a few more days after refreshing the memories of those about him his investigation might have determined that other contributions were made by Sinclair in 1920, 1922, and 1924. The governor said none were made. A little while later it is conceded that contributions were made by Sinclair to the fund by which he was elected, along with others, in 1918 and 1926.

The letter is further evasive, Mr. President, in that nowhere therein does he admit to the American people that he ever appointed Sinclair, when the record shows conclusively that he appointed this man as a member of his administration twice in the year 1920. The first time was in January, and the second time, for a five-year term, in June in the midst of his campaign for governor. Mr. President, Sinclair remained in office as racing commissioner until a month or two before his time should have expired normally in 1925.

Let me mention a date or two. On October 22, 1923, the Senate inquiry began. At that time Governor Smith was the chief executive of New York. At that time Racing Commissioner Sinclair was a part of his administration.

In November, 1923, witnesses from New Mexico told of Fall's sudden wealth. Sinclair was a member of the New York Democratic administration at that time.

On January 25, 1924, his attorney, J. W. Zevely, admitted that Sinclair loaned Fall $25,000 and advanced $10,000 for a trip to Russia. At that time Sinclair was racing commissioner of New York by appointment of the Governor of New York, and Mr. Alfred Smith was the Governor of New York.

On January 31, 1924, the Senate ordered Sinclair's lease canceled as fraudulent, and at that time Sinclair was a member of the administration of Governor Smith.

Mr. President, during all that period the Governor of New York never once asked for the resignation of Sinclair, his racing commissioner. Why? The only reason I can assign for his refusing to discharge him from his administration, or, at least, publicly ask him for his resignation, is that he considered Harry Sinclair a valuable public servant.

The Governor of New York must have believed that Sinclair, his racing commissioner, was rendering valuable service to the people of New York and to the country. Furthermore, Sinclair continued in that administration until the latter part of 1925 and then resigned. Why? For his own "convenience." That is the reason given. Was he requested to resign for the good of the State, for the good of the people, for the good of the country? No; he resigned voluntarily, for his own "convenience."

So it is difficult to see how the Governor of New York can get away from the fact that he knew all about Sinclair and still retained him as a member of his administration. Contrast this action with that of the Governor of Maryland in the last few days, himself a member of the Democratic Party, who has ruled that Sinclair's racing stable shall be kept from the race tracks in Maryland.

One other thing:

In 1924, when the whole country knew of the infamy of Sinclair, down in New York City they held the Democratic National Convention at Madison Square Garden; and I suppose Racing Commissioner Sinclair was there to assist the head of that administration in his aspirations for the Presidency. Right then, when they were voting on Governor Smith for the Democratic nomination, at that very moment Sinclair—the infamous, notorious Sinclair—was the racing commissioner of New York, and continued to be until the latter part of the next year. In the next letter he writes let the Governor of New York explain thoroughly to the American people, without evasion, his connections with his racing commissioner, Sinclair, during all those years.

Mr. President, I have no more to say about those two gentlemen at this time. I desire now to say a word about the leasing bill that caused much of our trouble.

Mr. President, there was one man who stood here—on this side of the aisle, by the way—and with prophetic vision saw through the maze of misfortune that would come to his country with the passage of that legislation. I refer to the late Senator from Wisconsin, Hon. Robert M. La Follette, who has passed on to the other side, who gave warning of the impending disaster, but it was not heeded. I shall quote just briefly from his remarks. I will take only one day of the debate, Mr. President—September 3, 1919, on page 4735, volume 58, part 5, of the RECORD—and read from a speech by the Senator from Wisconsin at that time:

Why, sir, this oil belongs to whom? It belongs to the public, not to the States, not to some administration, not to some committee of Congress. It belongs to the people. You have here—and have had around the doors of Congress and thronging the rooms of the committees that deal with these subjects—the representatives of the greatest monopolies in the world, seeking to get this legislation through according to terms agreeable to them; but, sir, when they take under legislation which we pass we can impose any conditions we please. We can require that the oil taken from these wells, or the coal mined on the Government land leased under the terms of this legislation, shall be prepared for the market on the ground, if need be; and my amendment gives the President the widest authority, and says that he is empowered, under rules and regulations, to determine how the products derived from these leased lands shall be handled, to the end that the price of them, reasonable to the producer and reasonable to the consumer, shall be determined by the Government. I say that there rest within the terms of that amendment the full power and authority of this Government, up to its constitutional limits, to control this product. It can say to Standard Oil, "If you take a barrel of oil out of this land, you shall keep it separated from the oil taken from other lands or assembled by you from other sources," and it can compel that to be done. It can make rules and regulations that will follow this oil out of the natural reservoirs where it rests, the property of the United States, the property of the people of this country, or until it reaches the consumers in every conceivable form at a reasonable price.

And more which I shall not read. I invite the attention of Members of this body to the entire debate.

Finally, the Senator from Wisconsin said:

Now, Mr. President, I renew my demand for a roll call on this amendment.

And I mention here the fact that among the nays appears the name of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who voted against the amendment of the late Senator from Wisconsin. I say, Mr. President, that had the Members of this body on both sides of the aisle listened to his counsel in that particular legislation the country would have been saved much misery.

I pass on.

On page 4742 of the RECORD, in the debate of that same day, I quote the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]:

The genesis of this bill goes back to a bill which was introduced in 1913 or 1914, it being in all essential particulars like this, although, of course, differing somewhat in details. That bill was introduced by myself, having been prepared by a committee called together by Secretary Lane, consisting of the chairmen of the Committees on Public Lands, the chairmen of the Committees on Mines and Mining, and the chairmen of the Committees on Agriculture, if my recollection is correct, of the Senate and House of Representatives. They, in conjunction with Secretary Lane and his assistants, prepared the bill. That is all I care to say about this being a Standard Oil bill.

Mr. President, that was in answer to the charge of the late Senator from Wisconsin that this bill was in the interest of the interests; and that was an admission by the senior Senator from Montana that the genesis of this oil legislation that has brought so much trouble to our common country was right at the beginning of the Democratic administration when the Democrats came into power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suppose probably the Senator's cursory examination of this subject is responsible for his error about the matter; but I take the occasion to inform him that the leases were not made under that law at all, but under an entirely different law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; I shall get into that, may it please the Senator.

On page 4754 of the RECORD of the same day I read the following:

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield further?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to understand how the Senator arrives at the conclusion that all of our evils—speaking about the oil scandal—came about from the enactment of a law that had not anything at all to do with the leasing of the naval oil reserves.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senator and I do not agree. In a speech which I hope to deliver next Monday or Tuesday I shall make a summary of this entire legislative program and of the evils that have come directly from it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust the Senator will defer it for a few days. I have agreed to go to the funeral of our late colleague from Michigan, Mr. FERRIS.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I shall be very glad to defer it until the Senator gets back.

Another Member of the Senate on the other side of the aisle, former Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, on the same day made this statement:

I should like to ask the Senator how the bill fails to protect the Government's interests in those naval reserves. I do not clearly understand the point.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To answer the Senator's question in just a brief way, it gives trespassers who have gone upon these lands, and against whom suits are pending, priority rights under the terms of this bill against anybody else, even in the naval reserves; and, of course, as to the naval reserves, if the reservation provision were protected, the public would not have any rights outside of these sections in this bill. So that it rewards these trespassers; it relieves them of defending their rights in the courts and taking the judgment of the courts as to whether they have any equity even in this territory; and it gives them out of hand rights in the naval reserves that they would not have except for this legislation. That is what it does. That is one thing it does.

Mr. President, again I invite the attention of the Senator to the comment of the late Senator La Follette on page 4759 of the RECORD. I shall read only one paragraph:

I say again, Mr. President, there are the Standard Oil and the Mid-West, which runs into Standard Oil, as I am told, and all the other oil representatives who are here now and have been and have maintained for months elaborate offices in this city, rich and powerful above all calculation, and no man can stand up on this floor and suggest any opposition that has been indicated anywhere at any time by those interests to this legislation. It has been seen heretofore. When anything was pending that did not conform to and adjust itself and accord with the interests of these great oil monopolies, particularly the Standard Oil, everybody knew it; it was manifest. Everywhere in the committee rooms and at every stage along the legislative career of a measure it was to be found. It has not been shown here any place. They seem to be heartily in accord with it, perfectly satisfied.

And more of the same sort, to which I invite the attention of the Senate.

The Senator from Montana a few days ago asked me for a reference to a time when he was governed largely by the advice of Mr. Doheny. I shall now quote the Senator's words.

On page 4770 of the RECORD of this same day, September 3, 1919, the senior Senator from Montana is quoted as using this language:

But I do not rely entirely, in respect to my judgment of the matter, upon these experts. However it may be regarded by anyone else, I attach very great importance to the testimony of Mr. E. L. Doheny to the same effect. It is well known that Mr. Doheny is one of the most extensive and one of the most successful oil prospectors and operators in the world. It appears that he has no interest whatever in any of the property within the naval reserve or in any of the withdrawal areas, and that he has no interest in any of the lands that would be patented. He does, however, own profitable and producing oil wells throughout the State of California. If he has any interest in the bill at all of an individual or personal character it would be to see the bill killed, because thus the volume of oil would be restricted and limited, if not reduced, and the value of his product would be proportionately increased. I can not believe, however, that he is influenced either one way or the other by that consideration; but he tells us, after his long experience as an oil prospector and an operator in oil, the fact is that the wells which now exist upon the reserve are continually draining the supply of oil and reducing the oil pressure, and he ventured the opinion that in 10 years the gas pressure would be so far reduced as to make it next to impossible to extract any further oil from the reserves.

I shall show, when the Senator returns, I think, that right at that moment this man Doheny had his eye on these reserves, as subsequently has been proved conclusively.

I do not charge the Senator from Montana with knowing of his plan. I am willing to believe that the Senator was misguided by Mr. Doheny. Yet the press dispatches recently have stated, if I remember rightly—and I may be wrong, and I would not knowingly make any statement that is not in accord with the record—that Mr. Doheny is to-day out in California slated to be one of the delegates in support of the candidacy of the Senator from Montana for the Presidency of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. Will the Senator tell us where he got that information?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I had that information from some newspapers. I shall be glad to include also in my later remarks the information I have and the conclusions I draw from that information.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The list of nominees for delegates to the Houston convention said to be favorable to my candidacy has been published broadcast. Their names are available at any time, and the Senator is misinformed; Mr. Doheny is not among them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I think perhaps I am in error in that. I think I had Mr. Doheny's name confused with that of George Creel, who was a publicity man during the Wilson administration, used, so Mr. Doheny testified, because of his close connections with the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels. Mr. Creel, I understand, is to be one of the delegates elected in California in favor of the Senator's nomination, and I think I am in error as to Mr. Doheny. However, I have been informed that Mr. McAdoo, who also received $250,000 from Mr. Doheny, by Mr. Doheny's own statement, is looking after the Senator's interests among the Democrats of California. I shall not dwell further on that at this moment.

I would like to say something further with reference to this same Mr. Doheny, who is still at large. I quote from the RECORD of February 7, 1924, just a little while before the national conventions of the political parties. There was some debate on the floor of the Senate. Much of this is familiar to older Members of the Senate; it was new to me and, I suppose, new to others. Perhaps the country has forgotten some of the things that took place then, and I think it might be well now again to mention a speech that was made at the Democratic national convention in San Francisco in 1920. I quote from the RECORD:

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think the distinguished Senator from Missouri will not object to what I am about to read, because it is a petition presented to a great convention in behalf of a noted Democrat. I read from page 437 of the proceedings of the Democratic National Convention presided over, as I remember, with distinguished ability by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The chairman said:

"The Chair presents to the convention Hon. Lorin A. Handley, of California, who will nominate a candidate for Vice President of the United States."

Then Mr. Handley said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, California needs no credentials in this convention other than her electoral vote in 1916. [Applause.] We are perfectly willing to yield the Presidency to Ohio [applause], but not the glory of electing the last Democratic President of the United States. The people of the great Commonwealth of California are not interested in the personal ambitions of any candidates for President or for Vice President. They are interested in this great Republic and its future. We believe that the hope not only of our country lies in the election of the nominee of this convention, but that the hope of humanity and the world rests upon it, and we call upon the patriotic citizens, not only of our State but of every State in the Union, in order that the honor of America might be rehabilitated and our Nation restored to her rightful place in the councils of the world.

"We not only want to elect the great Governor of the State of Ohio the next President of the United States but we want to elect with him a great patriot to stand by his side to make humanity's fight. And California has a great patriotic son. California agrees with the Senator from Montana, and California agrees with the Senator from Nevada that you must not overlook nor forget that the great West is populated by free-minded and independent American citizens. [Applause.] And with the great progressive Governor of Ohio and with a great progressive, patriotic Democrat of the West, the West can be brought into line again as it was in 1916. And California, therefore, presents her great and distinguished son, born in the State of Wisconsin. In poverty he started, a surveyor over the Southwest, a cowboy in Kansas, a prospector over practically every State of the West, a discoverer of the oil fields in southern California, and from thence he builds himself to the pinnacle of success such as every American citizen loves and admires, and California's son. The life of this man is a typical romance of American improved opportunity, and we take pride, therefore, in presenting to this convention as the man out of the West who can reach the hearts and the souls not only of the Democrats of the West but of the great, free-thinking people of the West. California, the great golden State, presents Edward L. Doheny for Vice President."

Well, he was voted on, and, so far as I know, has never to this moment been repudiated by the party leaders.

Mr. President, I want now to quote from some of Mr. Doheny's testimony on February 1, 1924, before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the United States Senate. I read from the printed record:

The CHAIRMAN. You testified that you would have been willing to retain Mr. Fall as you had retained Mr. Lane?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you retained Mr. Lane, I think you testified, immediately upon his resignation as Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir; and I made the agreement with him before he left office.

The CHAIRMAN. Before he left the office?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that one of the reasons that he resigned, on account of your employment?

Mr. DOHENY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your offer of employment, I mean?

Mr. DOHENY. No, sir; I don't think it had anything at all to do with it. He had two or three offers at the time that he resigned. He accepted employment with our company.

The CHAIRMAN. You never made any loans to Secretary Lane?

Mr. DOHENY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you employed any other Cabinet officer subsequent to his retiring from the Cabinet?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. DOHENY. Well, I am trying to think now. I think that we employed for a short time Judge Gregory, who was the Attorney General.

The CHAIRMAN. In what matter?

Mr. DOHENY. He was employed by our company and other companies to represent us before the—to represent us before the President in regard to a lot of permits that we were trying to get in Mexico, and that the Mexican Government was refusing to allow us to drill our own territory down there.

The CHAIRMAN. How long after Mr. Gregory's resignation was that employment?

Mr. DOHENY. I don't know. I only learned of it yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. You only learned of it yesterday?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Through whom did you learn that?

Mr. DOHENY. Through our books. Went through our books for answers to just these questions that you are asking about.

The CHAIRMAN. And your company had employed Judge Gregory?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir; our company and a half a dozen other companies. The employment was made by the Island Oil Co., for which he was the attorney, and he represented a number of companies, and the Island Oil Co. billed us for $2,000 as our share of the fee that they paid Judge Gregory for this particular work.

I turn now to page 1938:

And Mr. Gregory, who had been Attorney General, was employed to do what?

Mr. DOHENY. To represent these companies in filing their petitions before the State Department or the President, I don't know which, asking for the intervention or their good offices in connection with our demands that the Mexican Government give us the right to drill our own lands.

I turn now to page 1939:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, have you employed any other ex-Cabinet officers?

These are Democratic Cabinet officers.

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who?

Mr. DOHENY. At the time when our properties were greatly menaced in Mexico by the hostile attitude of the Mexican Government I employed ex-Secretary McAdoo.

The CHAIRMAN. One moment before we get to Mr. McAdoo. What was the total amount of money paid to Judge Gregory?

Mr. DOHENY. I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. You say your company paid $2,500?

Mr. DOHENY. Our company paid $2,000. I don't know what the total amount was.

The CHAIRMAN. But your company was assessed $2,500 for its share?

Mr. DOHENY. No; $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. $2,000?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, very well, go on with Mr. McAdoo.

Mr. DOHENY. I employed Mr. McAdoo because of his——

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. When was your employment of Mr. McAdoo?

Mr. DOHENY. I think it was—I am not certain about dates. It might have been a year after he left the Cabinet. He was a member of the firm of McAdoo, Cotton & Franklin, and I employed the firm—Mr. McAdoo was a member of that firm—to represent us in Washington in connection with Mexican matters.

The CHAIRMAN. In Washington?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell us the year? Well, that was about a year after, you said?

Mr. DOHENY. Well, that was about a year after he resigned from the Cabinet.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you furnish to the committee the exact date of that employment?

Mr. DOHENY. I think I have got it on our books. Yes, sir; I am quite sure it is on our books.

The CHAIRMAN. And how long did Mr. McAdoo continue to represent you?

Mr. DOHENY. Mr. McAdoo continued to represent us in that regard until the Mexican situation was practically completed. That is, until the administration changed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, he continued to represent you so long as Mr. Wilson's administration remained?

Mr. DOHENY. So long as he was President; yes, sir. And after that he didn't represent us in Washington any longer, except that he represented us in Mexico. And he made a trip to Mexico in connection with our affairs, the Palomas Land & Cattle Co.

The CHAIRMAN. And does he still represent you?

Mr. DOHENY. And he still represents us.

The CHAIRMAN. He still represents you?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were his services for you during the last administration compensated for?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you tell the committee how much you paid Mr. McAdoo?

Mr. DOHENY. All told, I think, about $250,000.

He was the son-in-law of the President.

Now, I shall read further from pages 1940 and 1941:

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any other member of the Cabinet or public official whom you have employed?

Mr. DOHENY. I think so. I think Mr. Cotter was an employee of the Interior Department before he came into our employ. He came into our employ with Mr. Lane. Mr. Lane, when he left the Interior Department, took Mr. Cotter with him. Mr. Cotter had been a sort of an amanuensis for him, and he needed him in his work generally, and he came into our employ at that time, and he is still in our employ.

The CHAIRMAN. He is vice president of one of your companies?

Mr. DOHENY. He is vice president of one of our companies; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was Mr. Lane's employment, Mr. Doheny? I mean what were his duties?

Mr. DOHENY. Mr. Lane was assistant to the president.

The CHAIRMAN. He was assistant to you?

Mr. DOHENY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In all matters?

Mr. DOHENY. In all matters; yes; adviser on everything.

The CHAIRMAN. Both as to matters that you had before the Department of the Interior, and all other matters?

Mr. DOHENY. Well, I don't remember about the Department of the Interior, but he advised me on all matters regardless of what they were.

The CHAIRMAN. I see.

Mr. DOHENY. But I don't think he ever went before the Department of the Interior as a counsel for us.

The CHAIRMAN. And what was Mr. Lane's salary?

Mr. DOHENY. $50,000 a year.

Mr. President, I shall not read what was said with reference to Mr. Garrison, but Doheny admits that Mr. Garrison, who had been Secretary of War in the Wilson administration, was also employed by his company.

That is four——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has again referred to the employment of ex-Secretary Lane by Mr. Doheny. Without really desiring to enter into any discussion with the Senator concerning the propriety or impropriety of the employment, I would like to inquire of the Senator if we are to understand from him that while Franklin K. Lane was Secretary of the Interior he extended any favors of any character whatever to Mr. Doheny?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not mean to imply anything. I am reading from the record.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; of course the Senator is reading from the record, and the record shows that after Mr. Lane retired from the office of Secretary of the Interior he went into the employ of Mr. Doheny. It shows further, as the Senator told us, that before he resigned there was an agreement that he should do this. That is important only as it carries with it an implication or an intimation that Secretary Lane did something wrong when he was Secretary of the Interior. I should like to know from the Senator——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not making any intimation of that character.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator is not making any inference, but he is quite willing the public should draw an inference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The public is quite well able to draw its own inference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator does not intend to indicate by this that Mr. Lane is subject to any criticism whatever for anything that he did while he was Secretary of the Interior, I have not any further inquiry to make.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me ask the Senator a question. Here were four Cabinet officers in the last Democratic administration all hired by these oil interests. Does the Senator think that was perfectly proper?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not care to discuss that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Nor I.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I said a moment ago, I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I shall discuss it later, I may say.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Whether it is proper or whether it is improper, all we are interested in, so far as I can see, is whether these officers faithfully discharged their duties while they were in office.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am willing to trust the intelligence of the American people on questions of this kind. Give the people the facts and they will draw their own conclusions, and usually correctly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator would not draw any conclusion that they had done anything wrong while they were in office, would he?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am drawing no conclusion. I am stating the facts as they were testified to under oath by Mr. Doheny.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand perfectly well what the Senator is doing. The Senator will not stand up in this body and say that in his judgment the inference is properly drawn that they were faithless in any respect to their charge, but he is perfectly willing that the public outside shall draw that inference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In the summary I hope to present of this whole question, which I shall deliver when the Senator is in his seat, I shall draw some conclusions of my own, and shall not hesitate to draw those conclusions.

Mr. President, I must hasten along. I have already taken more time than I had expected at this time. I have very little more about Mr. Doheny that I care to mention now.

In June, 1920, nine months after the Senator from Montana had introduced Mr. Doheny as the man on whose judgment he relied and four months after Mr. Doheny had employed Secretary Lane immediately upon his resignation, by reason of an agreement made prior to that resignation, the Democratic National Convention met in San Francisco. The official proceedings of that convention show that Mr. Doheny was one of four delegates at large from the State of California. They also show that he was a member of the committee on platform. Presumably he wrote the petroleum plank in the Democratic national platform of 1920, which began as follows:

> The Democratic Party recognizes the importance of acquisition by Americans of additional sources of supply of petroleum and other minerals, and declares that such acquisition, both at home and abroad, ought to be fostered and encouraged.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has made another reference to the Senator from Montana with respect to which I would like to ask a question. He spoke about this as being nine months after the Senator had declared that he relied on the judgment of Mr. Doheny.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just what does the Senator mean by saying that the Senator from Montana relied on the judgment of Mr. Doheny?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am attributing to the Senator's words which I quoted a while ago the usual meaning given to language of that kind.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Judgment on what?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator desire me to read it again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I have clearly in mind the language. The Senator from Montana relied upon the judgment of Mr. Doheny as to the likelihood of lands within the reserve being drained by wells outside of the reserve.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; and the Senator went further and said Mr. Doheny was a disinterested person.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was my information.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the Senator would not say that now, would he?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Perhaps I would not; but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, I know. I only want to show that the Senator can be mistaken. I am charging the Senator with nothing wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; certainly not; but why is the Senator referring to that statement if there is nothing wrong?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I refer to it again in order that the Senate and the people may draw their own conclusions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that the people can draw conclusions that the Senator does not dare draw himself?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senator is a candidate before the people for the presidential nomination on the Democratic ticket, and, therefore, must be an issue more or less before the people at this moment. I only discuss individuals as they are connected with issues.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; the Senator from Montana is perfectly willing that his entire record shall be searched, as it has been for five years past, but never mind about that. I want to call attention to the fact that what the Senator is endeavoring to convey, if I am not in error, is that I relied upon the judgment of Mr. Doheny concerning the wisdom of that legislation. That is not true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then I invite the Senator's attention again to that language and ask him to draw his own conclusion, and I will accept it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am speaking about what the Senator said. The Senator said nine months after I expressed myself as "relying on the judgment of Mr. Doheny." I relied on the judgment of Mr. Doheny, as the context will show, upon his assertion that wells outside of the reserve were draining the oil from within the reserve.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator still relies on the judgment of Mr. Doheny that far, does he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no occasion for my relying on it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is what I am asking the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The fact with reference to the matter spoken of there, as the record will show, demonstrated that the wells outside of the naval reserve No. 2 were in fact draining the oil from within reserve No. 2, and that Secretary Daniels recognized it was the fact and provided for the sinking of 22 offset wells in order to overcome conditions there referred to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator still indorse this leasing act which was passed in February, 1920, and the rider on the naval appropriation bill passed in June, 1920?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will answer unequivocally that I had a part in the passage of the leasing act and I take pride in that fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is what I wanted the Senator to say.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator can have that at any time. I might say further that I had not a thing on earth to do with the act of June 4, 1920.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator was in the Senate when it was passed, was he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator did nothing to prevent its passage?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I did not, nor did any other Senator. It passed without objection from anybody.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not speaking about any individuals. I just asked the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Senator would have again drawn an inference which is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am trying to state the facts from the record, and then the Senator can draw his own conclusions from my remarks and from the facts.

I had just quoted the plank or part of the plank on oil which, I am informed, Mr. Doheny wrote for the Democratic National Convention at San Francisco in 1920 when he was one of the delegates at large from California.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just wait until I finish this paragraph about that plank and then I will yield.

This plank was read along with the rest of the platform by CARTER GLASS, now a Senator from Virginia, who was chairman of the platform committee, and the official report of the proceedings of the convention states that the reading of this particular plank was received with applause by the convention.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to inquire now of the Senator from Indiana if he will kindly read the plank again and then tell us what objection he finds to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Again, I am not undertaking to find any objection to these facts except as I state my objection, but I am trying to state the facts fairly and impartially.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, but if the plank is unexceptionable, why state the fact?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. My judgment of it is that there was no occasion to have an oil plank in the platform at all. That is my opinion of it, if the Senator wants my honest opinion. No; oil will not be an issue next November when the people know the facts. The rank and file of neither party will permit it to become an issue.

But that was not the end of Mr. Doheny's very distinguished and valuable services as a leader of the Democratic Party in 1920. According to his testimony before the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys on December 3, 1923, he contributed $75,000 to the Democratic Party campaign fund that year, $50,000 of which was apparently contributed during the campaign and $25,000 of which was contributed after the election, at the solicitation of Mr. George White, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, for the purpose of wiping out a deficit. So here we have the direct evidence that oil money has reached the Treasury of the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is just another particular in which the Senator from Indiana seems to be uninformed. Mr. Doheny testified that he gave $75,000 to the Democratic committee, $25,000 of which was given in the year 1921, the remainder in 1920. Mr. George White, however, who was chairman of the Democratic National Committee, went on the stand and denied that Mr. Doheny gave any sum in excess of $34,000. I am disposed to let it go with that statement of the facts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Was the Senator at that time in 1920 still convinced that Mr. Doheny's reputation for veracity was good?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The testimony which was given——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator mean to suggest now that Mr. Doheny perjured himself on the stand?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The testimony which was given by Mr. Doheny was in 1924 and not in 1921.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Well, in 1924.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I do not intend to say that Mr. Doheny perjured himself. He was simply mistaken about the amount given.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator means to say that Mr. Doheny was mistaken about it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator means Mr. Doheny had thought he gave $75,000 and did not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; exactly. While Mr. White——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. White's testimony, as given——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. White spoke positively about the matter, and I take his recollection about the matter rather than Mr. Doheny's.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was just going to say about Mr. White that a search of the records of the Clerk of the House of Representatives shows that the Democratic National Committee made a return of only $9,800 as Mr. Doheny's contribution; in other words, the record shows that the Democratic National Committee's officials, if Mr. Doheny's sworn testimony is to be credited, must have concealed $65,000 of the contribution it received from Mr. Doheny, who was a member of its committee on platform and who was interested in the petroleum plank.

Well, Mr. President, we will not go into that any further. I want to quote now from the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]. On page 1805 of the RECORD of the proceedings of this body, on February 1, 1924, the Senator from Washington used language which, perhaps, will answer the question the Senator from Montana propounded to me a moment ago. I now quote the Senator from Washington:

> The testimony this morning shows that Mr. Doheny has had in his employ since they left President Wilson's Cabinet four of his Cabinet officials. What do these things mean to the country? They mean that the whole country begins to wonder whether anybody can be found who is clean and who can be trusted.

Oil will not be an issue next November, Mr. President, in my judgment. But the Senator from Washington mentions four Cabinet officers. I discovered another one, more or less accidentally, who is out on the trail of oil. Understand I do not question his motives in the slightest degree, but Mr. Sinclair has been thoroughly discredited—I suppose everyone will admit that—and was thoroughly discredited in 1925. I would not do anyone an injustice for the world; I do not know how reliable this authority may be; but I quote from it for whatever it may be worth, assuming that it is reliable.

The title of the book which I hold in my hand is "Oil imperialism—The international struggle for petroleum," by Louis Fischer. From page 195 of this book, under the head, "United States, Japan, and Russia," I quote the following:

> It is true that Robert Lansing, former United States Secretary of State, who had been retained by Sinclair, addressed a letter to the company on March 12, 1925, in which he disputes the soviet right of annulment. Yet he admitted in the same communication that the concession contract obliged Sinclair to carry out one drilling operation before the end of the second contract year. This Sinclair had not done.

I shall not read further and detain the Senate longer with this book. I simply invite the attention of any who may be interested to the book—Oil Imperialism, by Louis Fischer—and I cite it for whatever it may be worth.

So I say to the Senator from Washington that here is a fifth Cabinet member of the Wilson administration who has gone out in the pursuit of oil and taken employment under Harry F. Sinclair, the erstwhile racing commissioner of New York.

Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that, according to sworn testimony, there were employed by Doheny, a former Secretary of the Interior, a former Attorney General, a former Secretary of the Treasury, and son-in-law of the President, and a former Secretary of War; and I recently learned, if this authority be reliable, that a former Secretary of State in the same administration has been employed by Sinclair.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the legal employment by oil interests after retirement from the Cabinet is a matter of suspicion, what has the Senator to say about the fact that former Secretary Hughes now represents and is legal counsel for the Petroleum Institute of America, which includes all the oil interests in this country?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not discussing Mr. Hughes, and that makes no particular difference. Nor am I saying that any of this employment was illegal or that it was unethical or improper; I am only showing the trend of these former Cabinet officials in the direction of oil employment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the Senator unable to draw any difference between employment legally after retiring from the Cabinet and employment illegally while in the Cabinet?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. O Mr. President, I am not defending anybody. I say that this man Doheny and this man Sinclair are bipartisans; they have no party. I say they go out and do what they can to corrupt leaders in both parties wherever possible. I say they deserve no consideration whatever. In my judgment, and I am willing to be quoted on this, both of them deserve prison terms.

Mr. President, five Cabinet officers were employed by the oil interests that profited or expected to profit from the Teapot Dome and Elk Hills leases. It is rather significant that now the most prominent Democratic leader in the United States is discovered to have had as his racing commissioner up until the latter part of 1925 the same Harry F. Sinclair.

So it extended across the continent. In 1924 the Governor of New York, who at that time had in his administration Harry Sinclair, was a candidate for President on the Democratic ticket at Madison Square Garden. In that same convention William Gibbs McAdoo, from the other side of the country, California, who received $250,000 of Doheny's money, was a candidate for President. These are prominent leaders of the Democratic Party, to say nothing of Doheny and Judge Gregory and the others.

Mr. President, with the Governor of New York now a candidate for President, with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] now a candidate for President, who admits having been active in bringing about this legislation and having taken at least on some matters the advice of Mr. Doheny, and whose campaign is being largely managed, according to press reports, in California by the same Mr. McAdoo, it would seem that oil will not be an issue in the campaign next November.

Mr. President, I think I have nothing more to say on this subject at the present time. As soon as the Senator from Montana shall have returned I hope to speak again and draw some conclusions, and at that time I think I shall be able to show conclusively when, where, how, and by whom this conspiracy was hatched to defraud the United States Government and the people of the United States of the naval oil reserves.

RADIO REGULATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The migratory bird bill is before the Senate, and the pending question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator from Indiana desire to make a request?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; I wish to request unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside so that we may conclude the consideration of the conference report on the radio bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside temporarily the unfinished business?

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, Mr. President, I wish to be recognized.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not want to object, but I should like the Senate to permit me to say a few words, consuming about 10 minutes, in reference to the subject the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has just been discussing.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Maryland can say what he desires to say when the conference report is before the Senate as well as he can when the bird bill is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 2317) continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is recognized.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion with reference to the conference report on the radio bill. I will read the motion myself.

I move that Senate bill 2317 be recommitted to the committee of conference of the two Houses with instructions to the Senate conferees to insist upon the following amendment: In the first clause of section 5 strike out the following language:

SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 9 of the radio act of 1927 is amended to read as follows:

"It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide said equality the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones when and in so far as there are applications therefor."

And in lieu thereof to insert such language as to make the first clause read as follows:

SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 9 of the radio act of 1927 is amended to read as follows:

"It is hereby declared that the people of all the zones established by section 2 of this act are entitled to equality of radio broadcasting, both of transmission and of reception, and the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equal allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said zones."

The remainder of the section to read as in the conference report.

Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment which I desire to offer is to eliminate the ambiguous language that is admittedly and confessedly in section 5 of the bill. In that section such language is used as to make it confusing to those who are to interpret the act. My position is that we should pass an act about which there can be no misinterpretation. What we mean to say by this proposed legislation, and what the Senator from Indiana and what the Senator from Washington and other Senators who are favorable to the legislation say that it means radio power shall be divided equally among the various zones as soon as applications therefor are made. That is the whole thing in substance. That is what they say this language means. If it means that, why not say that and not say anything else? Why put in the act words that may give rise to confusion?

If we had a commission that was favorable to the legislation, if we had a commission that wanted to distribute fairly and justly, as shown by its acts in the past, I am rather inclined to think that we could well let this language go in. When, however, we are confronted by a commission that does not want to distribute equally, that has given three great broadcasting advertising stations one-fourth of all the power in this country, it does seem to me as sensible men that we ought to pass a bill that is free from misconception, one about which there can not be any doubt.

So, for that reason, Mr. President, I have made this motion, and I hope it will be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that under the precedents governing the recommittal of conference reports a motion to recommit a conference report is not in order where the other House has agreed to the report, inasmuch as the conferees on the part of the body agreeing to the report have thereby been discharged.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am familiar with that rule, and I am not inclined to differ with the Chair about it; but I have made this motion hoping that the point of order would not be raised and that this matter could go back to conference. Of course, the only way in which we could send it back to conference, as I understand the rules, is to vote down the report and then instruct the conferees. I do not know whether or not that can be done.

I want it understood, though, that with this confusing language in it I shall vote against the conference report. I should like to vote for it. I want to help in the equal distribution of radio. I want it to be free from any misconception or misunderstanding. It is for that reason that I have made the motion. I want to make my objection perfectly plain, and I hope I have done so.

It is perfectly manifest that if a fair distribution of this power is not made by the Radio Commission it will be because of this confusing language; and it seemed to me that it ought to be stricken out in the interest of good legislation. I hope these gentlemen are right. I believe that the commission can go forward and distribute the power equally under this law. They can do it; they have a perfect right to do it; but with the record of the commission before us, and especially with the record of Mr. Caldwell—who, I understand, is employed by a subsidiary of one of these companies—we can not expect an equal distribution. When we vote for this conference report we are voting in the interest of the unfair and unjust distribution that we now have, in my judgment, so I shall vote against the adoption of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

OIL SCANDALS AND CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has been so excited and, it appears to me, so hysterical about an alleged appointment made in the State of New York that, if I may use his own words, I may observe that he has not shown the great calm of which he speaks, which dignified and great statesmen always use. In fact, his original and pregnant observation that "Birds of a feather flock together" is so apropos of what I am shortly about to mention that I think it will go ringing down the corridors of time, or at least down the corridors of the Senate, as long as the Senator from Indiana is a Member of this body; for, when we analyze the Senator's remarks, all that we get from them is that what he knows about the alleged affair of which he continually speaks is what he reads in the papers; and it occurs to me that if his imagination is so vivid he would have been a tremendous success in the field of fiction had he selected that particular field of endeavor.

In order that I may not misstate the facts I have reduced them to writing, and, with the Senate's forbearance, will endeavor to give them to you for whatever they may be worth.

The Senate will recall that an honest public servant, the late Senator Samuel M. Ralston, had died in 1925, and it became necessary for the Governor of Indiana to appoint a successor. The exact manner of that appointment and its reasons remain a mystery to the country at large, and I may say they have become more of a mystery than ever in the past few days, when we have just heard the Senator; but I understand there is considerable evidence in Indiana as to the manner of its accomplishment.

The Governor of Indiana was then and is now Ed Jackson. I speak of him more later; but now it is sufficient to say that it is reported in Indiana that he first offered the position now filled by the Senator to one of the outstanding business men of the State. The latter went home to talk to his wife, and when he called up the next day to inform the governor he would accept he was told indirectly that the governor had changed his plans and that another man had been named, the same man who now sits in this Chamber.

I am also informed that the governor during the night on which his mind was so suddenly and mysteriously changed had conferred at length with one George Coffin, Republican county chairman of Marion County, in which Indianapolis is situated. Please bear his name in mind also. It is sufficient to say here that he had for 20 years been a personal and political friend of the appointee who now sits here, or I am so told.

And if Indiana report is correct—and this is a matter upon which I particularly desire the Senator to inform the Senate after I shall have concluded—across that conference there fell a shadow and a malign influence from a cell in a county jail 25 miles away, the shadow of one D. C. Stephenson, the mention of whose name is sufficient to soil the lips of him who utters it. Formerly grand dragon of the Ku-Klux Klan in Indiana, reported to have been ambitious to seize that organization in 22 States, he had lost his position after a quarrel with its other dictators, and—I am informed—he was then lying in his cell in Noblesville, Ind., awaiting trial for the dastardly crime for which he is now in life servitude in the Indiana State penitentiary.

For two years before this appointment of which I speak Stephenson, I am informed, had been the unquestioned dictator of the Republican organization in Indiana. I am told he walked the floors of a State convention of that party with a gun holstered on his hip, and with two gorillalike bodyguards in attendance, and that there were few men there who did not quail at the glance of his eye and hasten to do his bidding. Even as he lay in his cell, awaiting trial for a crime the gory details of which sicken the imagination, there were many, many persons eager to do his bidding—or so I am told.

Out of that triumvirate—or so I am told—came the appointment which concerns us to-day. Perhaps the Senator will speak as frankly upon it as he has on other appointments upon which he has possibly a less profound knowledge.

Now, as to the evil influences of bad companions—a copybook maxim which the Senator has so eloquently expressed in his profound and original dictum—"birds of a feather flock together."

Who is Ed Jackson, who made the Senator's appointment? He campaigned in D. C. Stephenson's car for the governorship of Indiana; and the latter, I am informed, claims that he spent $73,000 to elect Jackson governor, which he did upon a woeful day of a weeping week of a fearful year for Indiana, the year 1924.

The governor was indicted last summer along with—whom do you suppose?—the Senator from Indiana's old personal and political friend, Mr. George Coffin. What was the charge? It was that upon a day late in 1923 Ed Jackson, then secretary of state, carried to the then governor, Warren T. McCray, an offer of $10,000 and immunity from conviction in the State courts if he would name a certain man prosecutor of Marion County, in which the city of Indianapolis is situated. Jackson had come straight from another of those unholy and secret conferences in which the Senator's friends seem to specialize, according to report.

Gov. Warren T. McCray—you have all heard his name. He had at that time lost his fortune and was faced with indictment for misuse of the State's funds. He was later convicted in the Federal courts of fraud through the mails and sent to Atlanta penitentiary. But the people of Indiana have about concluded that he was much the more honorable man in that conference that day.

His son-in-law was prosecutor. Because of the delicacy of the situation, the prosecutor was resigning. So the conspirators, I am informed, proposed to seize this key position; and to do this they offered the penniless and despairing governor $10,000 and a guaranty of immunity from conviction for his official misdeeds before any jury in any State court in Indiana. And the governor knew they were powerful. Jackson, Coffin, Stephenson—they were names to conjure with. They represented the disciplined hate and prejudice of 300,000 citizens in bed sheets. That may sound comical now, but it did not so sound in the condition of affairs in Indiana in 1923.

Governor McCray sat there with the sweat rolling down his face and made his choice. It was an honorable choice and expressed in ringing words.

"Go back to those who sent you and tell them I have lost my fortune, I am losing my position, I may lose my liberty; but if I accepted your offer I would lose my self-respect, and I refuse," he said.

And what was the reason the conspirators wanted to control the prosecutor's position? As told in Ed Jackson's trial, they believed that the prosecutor's office could control the votes of 10,000 of the denizens of the Indianapolis underworld, and throw that much support to Ed Jackson in his candidacy for governor.

And incidentally to throw that much support to D. C. Stephenson in his plans to kidnap and gut the government of the State of Indiana! As unholy a purpose and as vile a conspiracy, carried out in as cruel a fashion, as ever stained the pages of the history of a State.

When the governor came to trial some weeks ago he listened to five witnesses telling in detail the story of the attempted bribe. Then, without a word of confuting evidence, his attorneys moved that he be acquitted on the ground that the conspiracy occurred late in 1923 and the indictment was not returned until 1927. The statute of limitations voids Indiana crimes after two years from their commission, and the State had not been able to prove concealment of the crime, which would have in turn voided the statute of limitations and permitted conviction.

Sufficient to say of Ed Jackson, the ostensible source of the appointment I am discussing, that, I am informed, 90 out of 100 Indiana citizens believe him guilty and writhe with impotent shame and anger at his continued presence in the governor's chair.

But the State is not done with George Coffin, the governor and the Senator's—I am informed—personal and political pal. He goes on trial May 2 next for the same offense. I am informed that the State has discovered new evidence to prove concealment, and that unless the sudden and mysterious illness of an important witness hampers the prosecutors—as happened in the governor's trial—they hope to establish concealment and thereby establish in the eyes of the law the guilt which public opinion of Indiana has already established.

I am keeping the Senate too long, and I am laying before it a history whose sordidness can only be excused on the ground that it is so pertinent here. A few more reports from Indiana—the correctness of which I hope the Senator will later enlighten us—and I am done.

I am informed, for example, that in his forthcoming campaign for renomination the Senator will be without the services of his campaign manager of two years ago, one Ora J. Davies, of Kokomo, Ind. Davies, I am told, was former State treasurer of Indiana, and while in that position placed a large amount of State funds in a bank which later failed. During investigation of the affairs of the bank, it is said, it was disclosed that the Senator's former campaign manager had gotten a rake-off of 1 per cent yearly on the funds he had so deposited, and he will be kept from managing the Senator's campaign because of the unfortunate necessity of answering an indictment charging violation of the State banking laws of Indiana, upon which he may soon go to trial. I am also informed that the indictment has unfortunately compelled this man to surrender a lucrative position as receiver of a national bank at Noblesville, Ind., to which he had been appointed by the Treasury Department, upon the recommendation, so it is said, of the Senator whose appointment is in question here. Perhaps he will inform the Senate whether his own indebtedness to the kindly offices of an appointing power led him to perform the same kindly offices for his former campaign manager.

I must hurry on, but I pause to remark that the great statesman and political genius who helped conduct the Senator's election campaign of 1926 as chairman of the State Republican committee, Clyde Walb—who benefited the Senator's campaign so much by charging that the international bankers had contributed millions of dollars to the Democrats of Indiana to defeat the Senator and his running mate and so brought the Reed investigation committee into the State—is now out of office as titular leader of the embattled Republicans of Indiana because of the unfortunate necessity of answering an indictment charging violation of the national banking laws, upon which he shortly will be brought to trial.

I can not here mention the minor members of the Senator's particular flock or galaxy—the birds with whom he has been flocking and whose plumage is presumably, according to his own masterful apothegm on this floor, similar to his own—a convicted mayor of his home city, elected under the same auspices which brought the Senator to serve his country from this floor, a half dozen indicted councilmen, and so on almost without number.

I might venture to ask, however, if the legal birds with whom the Senator has flocked—his Indianapolis law firm—has not done a large business in representing bootleggers and other violators of the prohibition laws in the courts of Indiana while the Senator, I am told, has gone hither and thither about the State making speeches under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League, which paid his expenses, upholding the sacredness of the prohibition law whose workings have been so profitable, as well as sacred, to these legal flocklings of the Senator's.

I might inquire also as to his tender solicitude for the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Indiana, who was convicted of contempt of the Supreme Court and sentenced to jail. I am told the Senator was accused, out of the letter file of a distinguished colleague, of seeking to bring to bear influence on that court in order to void or mollify the sentence of the Anti-Saloon League leader. This is hard to understand. All these matters are hard to understand for one who has not been trained in the peculiar politics of Indiana, but for the Senator's mind, which has shown such a profound grasp of the workings of politics in other States than his own, it should be mere child's play. I await his explanations, and his further remarks on the general theme that "birds of a feather flock together," and that some appointments may be sinister.

The only reason I have descended to this plane of speech on this occasion is that the man against whom the Senator by insinuation has made some very damaging statements is unable to come here and defend himself, or to have speech in this body. I would be the last man in the world to carry calumny or insult or insinuation to the floor of a body unless the man who was accused had an opportunity to rise and speak in his defense.

Now that we have drawn a parallel of things that directly affect the Senator, in line with the insinuations in another State, I hope he will take occasion to read the RECORD carefully and set out his answer to each of the points I have raised in extenso.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am, of course, surprised that any Member of this body would stoop so low as to deliver a personal attack against another Member of the Senate such as that to which we have all just listened. I do not believe there is another Member of the Senate who would have made a speech like that.

Mr. TYDINGS. I feel honored.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not believe that a single Member of the Senate on the other side of the aisle would stoop so low as to make that speech. I shall not answer it in detail. That part which applies to me I shall answer here and now.

I was appointed on the 20th day of October, 1925, to a seat in the Senate by the Governor of Indiana. I did not expect to be appointed. I do not know what motives inspired the Governor of Indiana to make that appointment. He might have exercised bad judgment, but I know something of what took place at that time. I have it from authoritative sources.

On the afternoon of that day the members of the Republican State committee of Indiana met on the call of the State chairman. They discussed a recommendation they might make to the Governor of Indiana as to a possible choice of the committee. I am informed that an overwhelming majority of the members of the State committee voted to recommend me for that appointment. I did not even know the meeting was being held.

I am informed authentically that the Republican State committee authorized the Republican State chairman to call on the governor and present my name to the governor as the name favored by the State committee.

I understand authoritatively that the Republican State chairman did call on the governor about 4 o'clock and remained with him until about 7; that he presented to the governor the views of the State committee; that the governor asked particularly if the Republican State committee desired the appointment of myself; that he was informed by the chairman of the State committee that that was the wish and the recommendation of the State committee; that largely on that recommendation the governor acted, decided to make the appointment, and sent for me to come to the executive mansion that night.

I arrived there about 8 o'clock in the evening. The governor informed me that he had decided to appoint me to the United States Senate, to the position left vacant by the death of my very dear friend, Hon. Samuel M. Ralston, who had served as a distinguished Member of this body on the other side of the Chamber, who, I may say, had been governor of our great State during two years of the time I happened to be a member of the State senate and at the same time the Republican floor leader, and for whom I had always the highest regard, and whose memory to-day I cherish. I accepted the appointment. That is the whole story.

In the campaign that ensued immediately I was opposed by four candidates in my party for the nomination for the unexpired term of my good friend Senator Ralston. In a field of five I was nominated by a majority over the entire field of nearly 75,000, notwithstanding the fact that these very malicious campaign lies and insinuations just uttered by the Senator from Maryland——

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not now. Were used in that campaign against me from one end of the State to the other. In the campaign that followed——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I think we are getting a little loose in our language. The Senator from Maryland, I think, violated the rules a while ago. I did not call him to order, because this has been rather a field day. The Senator from Indiana is using language just now which I think the Senate would not permit. The rules of the Senate provide:

> No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

It would have been our duty to call the Senator to order a while ago, but that would have compelled the Senator to take his seat, and then there would have been extended proceedings. I think my friend will see what I have in mind. We are using too much latitude in our language.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; Mr President, I agree with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to take the Senator from Indiana from the floor——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am very glad to withdraw the statement "campaign lies and insinuations just uttered by the Senator from Maryland." In doing so, I apologize to the Senate for the use of unparliamentary language of that kind. I will change it to this statement, "campaign misrepresentations and insinuations which were repeated or uttered on this floor by the Senator from Maryland."

Mr. President, at the ensuing election, about one month before the election date, the so-called Reed committee came into Indiana and, I presume, made a thorough investigation. The people were informed of all that came out of that investigation. These same misrepresentations were used against me at that time. I was elected by the people of Indiana to the seat I now hold by a majority of nearly 23,000. So that the people have passed on that question in my home State. Further than that, Mr. President, there is nothing for me to say. I still leave it to the judgment of my people, whom I love and who have shown their confidence in me. My nomination was never protested by anyone in the world. My election was never protested or contested by anyone in the world. Indeed, my honorable opponent, who is now a candidate for President on the Democratic ticket, Hon. Evans Woollen, a gentleman, immediately after the election sent me a very nice letter of congratulation, showing a very different spirit from that exhibited by the Senator from Maryland in the remarks which he has just delivered on this floor.

Mr. President, so far as individuals in Indiana who have been charged with offense are concerned, I shall say nothing at this time. A charge is a charge. It is not a conviction. If there are some unfortunate enough to have been convicted, even though they deserved conviction, I shall not discuss them on this floor. I would not discuss any of the internal troubles of the great State of Maryland on this floor.

Suffice it to say, Mr. President, that the State of Indiana, which I have the honor to represent here in part, can take care of her own internal affairs without any assistance from the Senator from Maryland or from the Senate of the United States. I need not attempt to defend Indiana. She needs no defense from me. Her glorious record of achievement throughout the years is far more eloquent than any words I might utter. It was on Indiana's sacred soil that George Rogers Clark, at historic old Vincennes, conquered the British and saved to the Republic the great Northwest Territory. It was on sacred Indiana soil in 1811, when a coalition was formed between the British from Canada and the Indians in the West under Tecumseh, that William Henry Harrison won the day and again saved the great inland empire for the Nation and made it possible to extend our boundaries from the Alleghenies ultimately, through the Missouri purchase, on out to the Pacific coast.

It was on Indiana's soil that a great war governor, in the days of the sixties, conceded to be the greatest of the war governors, upheld the hand of the great Lincoln, put down a rebellion, and largely made possible the preservation of the American Union. In all our wars Indiana has given without stint, and in proportion more in men and in money than any other State. She has been a saving force of this great Nation many times. She has produced statesmen. She has produced great men and women in literature, in the arts, in the sciences, in agriculture, in commerce, and in education.

Indiana is just as essential to-day to the general welfare as she has ever been. With as fine a State park system as there is on earth, with an unequaled system of State roads all paid for, with no bonded indebtedness saddled onto the shoulders of future generations, with the State completely out of debt to-day—one of the few in the Nation—and with more than $13,000,000 in her treasury she stands unrivaled among the States of the Union, the brightest jewel in the American diadem of States.

So, Mr. President, I shall not attempt any defense of the State from which I come. I am perfectly willing to have the people of my State and of the country judge of the propriety of the remarks made this afternoon by the Senator from Maryland.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3740) for the control of floods on the Mississippi River from the Head of Passes to Cape Girardeau, Mo., and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 619) thereon.

NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3387) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the tenth national convention of the American Legion, and I submit a report (No. 620) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to lend at his discretion to the Tenth National Convention Bureau, American Legion, for use at the tenth national convention of the American Legion to be held at San Antonio, Tex., in the month of October, 1928, 10,000 cots, 20,000 blankets, 20,000 bed sheets, 10,000 pillows, 10,000 pillowcases, 10,000 mattresses or bed sacks, and such field kitchens, tables, eating and cooking utensils and appurtenances as may be necessary for use in temporary restaurants: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered at such time prior to the holding of the said convention as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the general director of said tenth national convention bureau, the American Legion, Mr. Philip B. Stapp: Provided further, That the Secretary of War before delivering said property shall take from said Philip B. Stapp a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition and whole without expense to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, March 26, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, March 24, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Spirit of God, which once moved on the face of the waters, when order emerged from chaos, let us feel Thy rapture as we give ourselves up to Thy gentle guidance. The supremacy of Thy Holy Spirit is the inherent birthright of every man. Thy law, O God, makes a challenge, and we beseech Thee to make every day a solemn resolution which shall pay the homage that we owe to truth. By wise, unyielding devotion to the public weal, we shall crown the majesty of law, the greatness of our traditions, and the glory of the Republic. But infinitely more, may we exalt Thee in the moral terms of life and by our acceptance of Thy claims to our personal affection. Thy mercy has spared us, Thy bounty has blest us, and may Thy grace elevate us! Oh, we lift our drooping heads and forget our sins and our fears, because Thou art all glorious and King above all. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] may be given one hour in which to address the House on next Wednesday immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that on next Wednesday after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] may be permitted to address the House for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he took this up with the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, which committee has the call on Calendar Wednesday? It does not seem to me when we have Calendar Wednesday so rarely we ought to cut in on that day without at least the permission of the chairman of the committee having the call.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I took the matter up with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and he suggested this would be a good day.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, some of the committees that are now being called on Calendar Wednesday have not enough bills to take up an entire day. We have been caught in this way two or three times heretofore.

Mr. BEGG. Then why not let the gentleman talk after Calendar Wednesday business is out of the way?

Mr. TILSON. As we are going now we have about as much to do on one day as another, and it would not make any real difference on which day we hear the gentleman.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Either Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday would be satisfactory to the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman wants to speak on his travels in the Philippines, China, and Japan.

Mr. TILSON. At this time in the session we are very apt to have special rules for business on Tuesdays and Thursdays, so I should regret having too much of the time on those days taken up with what amounts to general debate. We have already a special order for one hour on Tuesday under an order entered some time ago. So far as I can see now, Calendar Wednesday would be just as satisfactory as any other day, and I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

MESCALERO RESERVATION, N. MEX.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3007) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions for a certain tract of land on the Mescalero Reservation, N. Mex., and pass the same. This bill is identical with the bill (H. R. 10475) introduced by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MORROW] and unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3007, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions a patent in fee for the unsurveyed tract of land of approximately 10 acres, now occupied and improved by the St. Joseph Mission on the Mescalero Indian Reservation in New Mexico, formally reserved for the said mission by order of the Secretary of the Interior dated June 25, 1912: Provided, That before such patent is issued the said corporation shall deposit with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs whatever amount of money may be required to pay the expenses of a survey to be made under the supervision of the General Land Office.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

CANCELLATION OF BALANCE DUE FROM THE SALE OF CATTLE TO CERTAIN ROSEBUD INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. 3355) to authorize the cancellation of the balance due on a reimbursable agreement for the sale of cattle to certain Rosebud Indians, which is identical with the bill H. R. 11582, unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3355, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That with the consent of the tribal council the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cancel the unpaid balance of $12,204.46 due on reimbursable agreement No. 281, signed by 17 Rosebud Indians for cattle purchased from tribal funds appropriated by the act of June 30, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 26).

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the time has gone by for objection, but if the gentleman will yield me a moment I would like to make this suggestion: I suppose this bill is one that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs thinks is quite unimportant and therefore he calls it up in this way. I believe the House ought to have a chance to go into these bills before they are called up in the House.

Mr. LEAVITT. I will state to the gentleman that this bill has been on the Calendar for quite a number of days.

Mr. CRAMTON. It has not been on the Consent Calendar very long because I make a study of that calendar and it was not on the calendar within the range of my study. I am not going to object to this bill, but I think unless there is some urgency about a bill, we should have an opportunity to make some study of it before it comes up in this way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The bill is on the Union Calendar, I apprehend, and it could not be taken up at this time except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is true.

Mr. CRAMTON. The stage has passed for objection and I am only appealing to my friend not to bring them up quite so precipitously.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, when a bill is on the Consent Calendar, some of us give it some study and we depend upon its being called up on that particular day, so that if there are any objections we can intelligently make them. It is humanly impossible to retain the facts with respect to all the bills on that calendar in your mind without having a memorandum of them, and this action certainly takes me by surprise.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman is perfectly correct. My observation simply went to the point that one objection would, of course, prevent consideration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But a Member does not want to object unless he has justification for objecting.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why do not the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Michigan appeal to the Speaker of the House of Representatives to adopt the policy they speak of? Why do the gentlemen criticize the gentleman from Montana for undertaking to get his bills through?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not criticizing the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the gentlemen want the policy adopted of not bringing these matters up by unanimous consent, that is a matter that is within the control of the Speaker and I suggest the gentlemen make their appeal to him.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not criticizing the gentleman from Montana. I have known him so well that I thought it would be entirely sufficient to appeal to him.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. There might be others, and you would have to appeal to each one. If you appeal to the man that controls the situation and convince him, you would not have to appeal to the sundry and various Members.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What would the gentleman from Texas do?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I would adopt the best rule, and I think he would do the same thing.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I would like to have the attention of the majority leader of the House. I notice in the RECORD every morning there is a statement given out by the leader as to committee meetings to be held on that day. It has seemed to me that nothing could be more desirable than for the leader to follow that with a statement of the business that is expected to be taken up in the House on the day that the RECORD appears. It would be comparatively easy to do that. Then Members would have some notice of the matters to be taken up, without, as is now the case, having no sufficient knowledge.

Mr. LEAVITT. This bill was passed by the Senate, and the RECORD shows that it came over here, and every Member had full knowledge that it was subject to being called up.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am not objecting to this bill, but the reply to that remark is that the situation is similar with respect to so many bills, and nobody can foretell what particular bills will be considered when the House meets. I am only trying to suggest a method of getting rid of this uncertainty.

In the English House of Commons the record that is issued any day contains, as I understand, a statement of the business that is to be called to the attention of the House on that day. It seems to me that we ought to have a practice in analogy to that.

I have not been here a very long time, but since I have been here there have been a great many cases of measures unexpectedly taken up, measures of very great importance, in which absent Members were interested. We can so easily get rid of that condition if my distinguished friend from Connecticut, who has charge of the conduct of business to a large extent, is willing to do so.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in the first place neither the Speaker, the floor leader, nor anyone else knows just what may be brought up here. They do not know what Members are going to ask unanimous consent to consider, just as the gentleman from Montana has done to-day.

Mr. LEAVITT. It would have been possible for any one Member to object to this bill.

Mr. TILSON. It would. There is some justice in the criticism of the gentleman from Michigan, that Members ought not to ask unanimous consent for the passage of a bill without some notice.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me say—you may not believe it—but I do not like to object to a bill on the blind chance that it may be undesirable. I like to know the grounds of the objection before making it. As to these two bills, neither of great importance, I know nothing about them.

Mr. LEAVITT. If they had any far-reaching importance I would not ask to bring them up in this manner.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to say that I like to give notice to Members as far in advance as possible of what business is expected to come up, and so have been posting each Saturday the tentative program for the succeeding week. I shall continue to do this, as I have heretofore done, by bulletins in the Speaker's lobby, but to tell the night before what is going to happen the next morning I can not always do it.

I am not entirely convinced that we ought to adopt the English Parliament method. We know that the House of Commons is a very large body—several hundred more than we have in this body, and a hundred is a quorum. A large proportion of the members do not attend at all except when bills of very great importance are to be taken up, or bills in which members are specially interested. I hope that we may never come to this practice. The entire membership of this body should feel interested in all business that is going on. They should be here and know what is going on instead of relying upon the leader or anyone else to inform them in advance so that they may be present or remain away as their own interests may dictate. I think that this attitude toward the public business is not the correct one and should be discouraged.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman? The last remark of the gentleman is a supposition which is not verified in practice. I still believe the gentleman might profitably print in the RECORD some sort of a tentative statement about the business probably to come before the House, as he furnishes a statement about the committee meetings.

Mr. TILSON. If anyone is here when the House adjourns he knows what the unfinished business is, if there is unfinished business, and that if the rules permit, it will come up on the following day unless there is special announcement to the contrary. By a glance at the RECORD he will get the same information. If there be no unfinished business he can look at the tentative program in the corridor and see what business is expected to be taken up on the succeeding day.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. To use an old adage, success seems to be the reward of vigilance.

Mr. BLANTON. And they ought to know it intuitively.

Mr. LEAVITT. And permit me to add right there that the reason I am particularly anxious about these bills which are of minor importance is that 5 per cent of the legislation passed in the last Congress had to come out of our committee. We had to take advantage of this opportunity.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Navy Department appropriation bill, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has remaining 1 hour and 1 minute of general debate, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] 58 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, Orville Staples was one of the most active, fearless, conscientious enforcers of the law when he was a member of the park police force. Because of unjust treatment in that force occasioned by his arresting prominent individuals, I caused the Civil Service Commission to transfer him to the Metropolitan police. He has been one of the most diligent, active, efficient, fearless, and conscientious enforcers of the law on this force. He is hated by all crooks.

When recently I developed in an investigation before our Gibson committee that since last June, with police protection both in Washington and other cities, prominent bootleggers, in a truck specially built with a secret compartment holding 120 five-gallon cans of whiskey, had been transporting loads of liquor regularly into Washington from Philadelphia, Lancaster, Chester, Baltimore, and other places, and were never molested until recently a policeman in uniform hijacked them one morning at 5 a. m., and stole their load of liquor, it was reported in his precinct that Orville Staples had furnished me the information that led to the seizure of this truck and the confession of its owner and two drivers.

On March 7, 1928, I was informed that Officers Hunt and Schenck had been heard to say "that Staples had tipped BLANTON off and that they were going to get him."

The next morning at 7.45 roll call, I went to the police station where these officers worked, and addressed them en masse. I told them that I had heard that a threat to "frame Staples" had been made, that my information on the hijacking was not received from Staples, but from other officers and citizens, and that I was going to see that they did not frame Staples.

On the 6th and 7th days of March, 1928, by combing the "underworld" of Washington seven affidavits were procured, some affiants being colored bootleggers having police records as long as your arm, charging Staples with improper conduct. If they had been true, Staples should have been suspended on March 7, 1928. But nothing was done about them.

On the night of last Saturday, March 17, 1928, Staples was told by his captain that he was suspended under orders of Major Hesse. Staples demanded the charge. No charge was given him, but his pay was stopped.

I have had active experience as a lawyer and judge for 31 years. Never before have I ever heard of a more dastardly, infamous, lying, outrageous frame-up than this attempted upon Staples. It is a disgrace to the Metropolitan police force of this Nation's Capital.

To show how utterly preposterous this testimony is, I want to call your attention to it. Two witnesses swear positively that at 4.30 p. m. on February 24, 1928, Staples assaulted a woman in her apartment. The preceding day, Dr. Carl S. Keyser performed an operation upon Staples, and from February 23 to February 26, inclusive, 1928, Staples was lying flat on his back in a bed in a hospital.

Two negro bootleggers, Lawrence Coleman and his cousin John, testified that they had a truck with 35 cases of liquor stored in the Straymore Garage, and that on the morning of March 27, 1927, Staples took it and reported only 6 of the cases to headquarters, stealing the balance, and that Coleman had paid Staples to protect him.

The facts are: Officer Agnew sent Staples to said garage one morning under orders to get said truck and liquor. Staples took charge of it, and finding the engine would not work, pushed the truck out of the garage to the corner where there was a police box, called the police station, and in the presence of many bystanders watching, held the truck there until the patrol came with three officers, and they listed the liquor at the police station themselves. Staples immediately brought Coleman to the station, and he denied that it was his truck, and denied that he knew anything about the liquor, and Staples went to Assistant District Attorney Hart that day and tried to get a warrant for Coleman, but because the truck was listed in a woman's name at a fictitious address, and Coleman denied all knowledge of it, the warrant was refused. And learning the next day that negro employees working in said garage, who reported the presence of this liquor truck in the garage, had themselves stolen it before he had gotten there, Staples with other officers looked up, found, and took charge of several of the cases of liquor thus recovered.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield now. On March 19, 1928, I went to Commissioner Dougherty, police commissioner, and told him that Staples was being framed, and that a trial board, hand-picked by Major Hesse from his employees, would undoubtedly convict Staples, in fear of reprisals, and that since finally the commissioners would have to pass on the case, I urged that they investigate the case first, and thus save their police department from being thus scandalized. This, he refused to do.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I understand that these cases are now before a court sitting in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; they are not.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I want to know, Mr. Chairman, if it is within the right of any Member to try a case here, or put in a defense here before it is heard in the court?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have a right to put anything in the RECORD that is not offensive, in general debate. That has been held so many times, long years before the gentleman from Massachusetts ever heard of Congress, that it is unnecessary to argue it now.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It might be the gentleman's right under the rules, but it is unethical.

Mr. BLANTON. And if it is my right under the rules, then the gentleman from Massachusetts is out of order when he interferes in this proceeding, as he usually is when he gets out of his bailiwick, which is the Claims Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts press his point of order?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I would like a statement from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any rule which controls debate in the House except, of course, that of orderly procedure and proper decorum. The Chair is not aware of any rule which relates to the subject matter of remarks made on the floor of the House.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then I take it the Chair could not rule on the moral right of a Member to do certain things.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not rule on the moral aspects of a matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I accept the gentleman's apology, and will take dinner on him later. It is presumed, whenever this House of Representatives permits things to be done under its rules, that those things which it permits are moral. I will take the dinner on the gentleman later.

Mr. Chairman, I now want to proceed without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks to be permitted to proceed without interruption.

Mr. BLANTON. No charge was preferred against Staples until on March 22, 1928, I demanded for him an immediate trial. I demanded that whatever they had against him be duly preferred in charges and that he be tried Monday.

Our splendid corporation counsel, Judge Bride, agreed with me that Staples had the right to demand this, and charges were prepared that same day and delivered to Staples that night, March 22, 1928.

On the preceding night of March 21, 1928, when Staples put his car in his garage, from a high hill just opposite his garage, some one from ambush shot at Staples, and the steel-clad ball, such as is used in police revolvers, went into the glass window of his car, just a few inches from Staples head, and went through the front seat.

Not only has he been framed and an effort made to ruin his good name but some one tried to take his life.

Orville Staples is not going to be framed. And I want the framers to understand that, and I now give them notice of it. I say this to you gentlemen. The main one who is trying to frame Staples arrested two sons of a Congressman not long ago and took them to a police station and, in violation of his duty, because he got mad at them, he beat them unmercifully. This young Orville Staples, as brave as a lion, saw him do it, and Staples said, "If you touch those boys again I will arrest you and lock you up, even if you are a policeman." That is the starting of all the enmity that has led up to this frameup, and the officer told Staples that he (Staples) was trying to protect Congressmen. Congressmen and their sons are entitled to no better treatment than other good citizens and their sons. But they are entitled to lawful treatment. No policeman is authorized to beat anyone under arrest. Staples is the kind of policeman who believes that every man has a right to protection of the law, even if he is a Congressman, and that a policeman has no right to beat up two sons of a Congressman just because they are the sons of a Congressman. I can not forget the infamous outrage that was accorded our distinguished friend from Indiana sitting here before me, whose name I shall not call, when his good wife misunderstood a traffic signal and started across the street. She was arrested and taken to a police station at night, with a little child. She told them that she was a Congressman's wife; but although they will turn a crook loose on $5 collateral, they held that good woman there until 10 or 11 o'clock at night—all because of some inadvertent infringement of an insignificant traffic regulation. I want to say this in conclusion. The newspapers say that Orville Staples is a protégé of mine; that I am his friend.

I want to say that Orville Staples is no more to me than any other of the honest policemen among the 1,348 in Washington. If they are honest, I am their friend; but if they are dishonest and if they are crooks, I am not their friend. I am not going to allow them to frame Orville Staples. I promise you that. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. UPDIKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. UPDIKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I wanted to say a few words this morning with reference to the position that the United States Government has taken regarding Nicaragua. I had the pleasure to serve with the United States Marine Corps in Haiti, San Domingo, and Cuba before the war, and I know the good work that was done in that vicinity by the United States Marine Corps.

I heard the statement made on the floor of the House yesterday that we ought to send civilians into Nicaragua to take care of the situation there. I believe that the gentleman who made those remarks was sincere in his ideas, but I know that will not work. I know that it would be useless to send civilians into a place like Nicaragua under the present conditions and expect to get any results whatsoever. To my mind, it would be suicide to those people who went there trying to straighten out a revolution, not having had any experience in dealing with the people of that country.

It seems to me that with the background and the training that is given to the United States Marines, with the diplomatic course which they pursue to handle any situation, they are the logical people to maintain peace and order in Nicaragua. I have talked with several officers and men who have returned from Nicaragua; I have talked with General Lejeune himself; and they all tell me the same story, that the presence of the United States marines in Nicaragua is straightening out the situation; that the good people of Nicaragua are glad that the marines are there, and want them to remain until after their election and they are able to stabilize their Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes; I yield to my good friend the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can not the gentleman place himself in the position of a free citizen of the Republic of Nicaragua and seek to imagine his feelings in going to the polls under the protection of police, guarded and supervised by the armed force of another country?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes. The same situation existed in Port au Prince, Haiti, in 1916 until the marines were able to stabilize that Government, and the gentleman knows there has been a great improvement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But that does not justify it.

Mr. UPDIKE. I want to say to you that the good citizens of Haiti and the good citizens of Santo Domingo welcomed the United States in the supervision of their elections in 1916 which were carried on in an orderly way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who does the gentleman call the "good citizens"?

Mr. UPDIKE. The better class, the good citizens of Haiti and Santo Domingo, those who realize they need some staple form of government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then we are down there protecting a certain class?

Mr. UPDIKE. No. We are down there to protect everybody, to create a friendly feeling among one another.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. At the point of the bayonet.

Mr. UPDIKE. At the point of the bayonet, if necessary, and by getting the different factions together down there, so that they can stabilize their government, as I have stated before.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You can not do that by saddling the marines on them.

Mr. UPDIKE. That is the gentleman's opinion. But I have had experience myself. I know the good the marines did in Santo Domingo; I know the good they did in Haiti; I know the good they did in Cuba. They saved and protected thousands of lives, cleaned up the filthy condition that existed, built roads, and created a decent place to live.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes; I yield to my good friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Then following the logical conclusion of the argument of my friend from Indiana, when we get through with Nicaragua and China we ought to send our marines to Russia and create a good feeling there by creating a stable government.

Mr. UPDIKE It is a different proposition altogether. The United States has not recognized that government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman consent to sending marines to Indiana for the protection of the people there?

Mr. UPDIKE. I am willing to send them anywhere.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes.

Mr. MAAS. As a matter of fact, are not the marines going to supervise the election in Nicaragua at the request of the vast majority of the people of Nicaragua?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes; at their suggestion. They asked us to come in there and supervise their election and acquaint their people with American ways.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes. I yield to my good friend from New York.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Does not the gentleman think that the average citizen of Nicaragua would prefer casting his ballot under the supervision of marines to casting it under the conditions that otherwise would prevail there?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes. I think the good-thinking people prefer the marines, because they know the marines can do a lot of good.

Mr. GIBSON. And that is to be done at the request of the Government of Nicaragua?

Mr. UPDIKE. Yes; of the regularly constituted Government of Nicaragua, which the United States Government has recognized.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. UPDIKE. No; I regret I can not yield to my good friend from Oklahoma. I would like to yield to all questions, but I have only 10 minutes' time, and I want to talk about the situation in Nicaragua.

I know that the people of Nicaragua are the same kind of people as the people of Haiti and of Santo Domingo and of Cuba.

I know they have asked the United States Government to send protection to their citizens and to protect American life and property in Nicaragua.

So I want to say this to you in conclusion: It is my prediction now that if we are allowed to go ahead in Nicaragua to supervise this election, which we are going to do, we will be able to promote peace in that great country. [Applause.] There are great possibilities in Nicaragua, because it is a rich country. I want to say this to you: That those people are entitled to protection and the United States Government is entitled to protect the property and lives of its citizens in that domain. [Applause.]

Some folks have stated that by sending the marines into Nicaragua we are in war. No charge like that was made when we sent marines to Haiti and Santo Domingo. Of course, we are not in war. We are not the aggressors. All we attempt to do is to maintain peace and order, the same as we would here in the United States if we had to send the militia or any other armed force into a territory where there was an uprising and revolution.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But they would be our own troops.

Mr. UPDIKE. These are our own troops also.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But not in our own country.

Mr. UPDIKE. They are United States marines protecting American lives and American property.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But they are not operating in our own country.

Mr. UPDIKE. But we have American lives and property to protect in that country, and I am in favor of protecting American property and lives anywhere in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I asked for these five minutes in order to make the speech, or one similar to it, which has been made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. UPDIKE]. I heard yesterday the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and the interpolations by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], and I thought then that it was necessary for some one to answer the statements which were made by those two gentlemen. The gentleman from Indiana has done so, and he has done so fully. I want to congratulate him upon what he has done.

There is one thing, however, he did not take up, and that is the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. It seems he wanted our Government to send marines to Nicaragua, but not quite so many of them. He said we have sent so many that it begins to look like a military expedition. That suggestion would be suicidal if it were carried out.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Precisely what I said was this: That in the Harding administration and in the Wilson administration a little bunch of marines had sufficed, and I believed that in 1926 the Secretary of State made his initial mistake in sending such a very heavy military force to Nicaragua. I think I know why he did it, but in my opinion his reason for doing it did not justify the thing in being done.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The reason he did it was because he did not want to send a few men to certain death.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No. I believe he apprehended we were going to be involved with the near-by Republic of Mexico. That is my supposition.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Whatever the gentleman's supposition, the conditions that have arisen there have made it necessary to send more marines. I am glad the President has seen fit to send them. Nicaragua is a much-disturbed country. It is a country of mountains and jungles, and I say it would have been suicidal to send a small force into such a situation. If you are going to do a thing, do it well and send enough men to protect those you do send, and make certain of the result.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Does not the gentleman think it would be more advisable to send our marines to supervise the elections in Philadelphia than in Nicaragua?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman's remarks are entirely irrelevant.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Has there been any bloodshed thus far in Philadelphia?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course there has; and in Pittsburgh, too.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. So far as the suggestion of sending marines to Philadelphia is concerned, it may well be relegated to the political jokes of the period. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE] is in the habit of underestimating his own country; but I am not.

He needs to be reminded of the fact that we are not in Nicaragua on our own volition. We are there because we were asked to go there to help solve a situation which had become intolerable. We are there to keep the peace and to help the people to establish a government and to stabilize it. We have nothing to serve there except the good of the people. We want to get out of there as quickly as we can.

What the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE] has said, and what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] said on this floor yesterday may well be sent to Nicaragua to comfort and to encourage those who are disturbing the peace of that country and who are waging guerrilla war on the American marines. I am sure that the bandit leader, Sandino, will receive their messages with the greatest acclaim, but their words will be less welcomed by the American marines.

Such messages are all contributions to Sandino's cause. They will put new energy into those who are seeking to kill our American soldiers. From first to last the insurrections in Nicaragua have been fed on the sympathies of Americans expressed on this floor and more on the floor of the Senate. Had it not been for such encouragement the insurrection would never have amounted to much, and the lives of marines which have been sacrificed there may, in part, be charged up against ourselves. We ourselves have encouraged the rebellions which we are seeking to quell.

Mr. KVALE. It is not a rebel movement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I am not able to agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that Sandino belongs to the patriots of the world. I think he is more akin to a man that we used to know in this country by the name of Jesse James, and he occupies about the same relationship to affairs in Nicaragua that Jesse James did to affairs in the United States.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Jesse James was not protecting the country of his birth from a foreign invasion.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Neither is Sandino. There is no foreign invasion on the part of the American people.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What does the gentleman call it?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. We were invited to go there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. By whom?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. By the regularly constituted government of that country; and I want to add the further thought that in addition to this invitation we went there at the request of foreign governments. [Applause.]

It is no secret that in the beginning of these troubles, when the property of all foreigners was threatened in Nicaragua, at least two foreign governments—those of Great Britain and Italy—asked us categorically whether it was our purpose to protect all nationals under the Monroe doctrine. We accepted that duty, and if we had not done so Great Britain and Italy would have their warships in those waters now, and the Monroe doctrine would have been torn into shreds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FURLOW]. [Applause.]

Mr. FURLOW. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced in the House of Representatives a bill designed to increase the efficiency of the Air Corps by creating therein an Air Corps promotion list, upon which will be carried the names of all officers of the Air Corps of the Regular Army below the grade of colonel.

For many years the question of the injustices on the single list of the Army have been discussed in hearings before the Military Affairs Committee and other committees and boards. Although it has been recognized that there were a number of injustices in the Army, it has been learned that the Air Corps as a branch has by far the greater percentage, and, in fact, it has several times been reported to our committee that a War Department board, after thoroughly investigating this subject, found:

> The Air Service is the only branch or arm of the service which is adversely affected as a corps by the promotion situation.

This board even went so far as to state they felt—

> The situation will affect adversely the efficiency of the Air Service.

To date no legislation has been enacted, or even proposed, which would benefit the Air Corps any more than any of the other branches, except such as has been advocated in hearings before our committee by the Chief of the Air Corps himself, who stated that he "greatly preferred a separate promotion list for air-service officers." After much thought upon this subject and some experience in the Air Service myself, I believe a separate promotion list for the Air Corps to be the only practicable solution at the present time. It so happened during the World War period that it required many months longer to train Air Corps officers than it did officers of other branches, with the result that two officers entering the service on the same day, one in the Air Corps, the other in one of the other branches, now find themselves separated on the single promotion list in many cases by thousands of files, meaning years of difference in promotions, the Air Corps officer, of course, being the one adversely affected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FURLOW. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it not true that in peace time there are more casualties in the Air Service or more officers disabled in the Air Service than in any other service?

Mr. FURLOW. That is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, this is true from the very nature of their duty, and every time an air officer is either killed or incapacitated the officers of all branches of the Army move up on the promotion list, including the Air Service officers.

Mr. FURLOW. That is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And is it not also true that the Air Service differs from other branches of the service, such as Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry, in that their superior officers in time of action must be young men, because either a flight commander or a squadron commander of the grade of major or lieutenant colonel must be with his squadron in the air in the performance of a mission?

Mr. FURLOW. That is true; and the gentleman from New York speaks from experience, because I recall that the gentleman flew at the Italian front. And further answering the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], I want to state we must consider the higher casualty rate that exists in the Air Corps whereby this branch of the service, with only one-twelfth of the authorized commissioned personnel of the Army, bears annually over 40 per cent of the casualties on the active list. It is obvious that with the majority of the Air Corps officers in the lower files on the promotion list that it is those nearer the top who, as a general rule, are promoted to the vacancies thus created. At the same time the replacements in the Air Corps are generally in the lowest grade and, of course, right at the bottom of the list. Such a system will inevitably result in placing the Air Corps lower and lower in average rank on the promotion list until that time is reached, if ever, when the hump of Air Corps officers all become due for promotion within a very short time of each other. The War Department report submitted in compliance with the Air Corps act of July 2, 1926, leads me to believe that all these junior officers of the Army can ever hope to reach is the grade of major.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FURLOW. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Some of the officers who were in the service with the gentleman from Minnesota and myself, in our own detachment, remained in the service. This was in 1917, and they now have 11 years of service, and they are still lieutenants way down on the list.

Mr. FURLOW. My information supports that statement.

When considering a promotion list there are two factors which always enter, namely, a rate of promotion and a rate of retirement. I have, therefore, provided that the system of promotions shall closely follow that recommended to Congress by the War Department for the whole Army, but with a slightly increased rate in order to offer brighter prospects to the Air Corps officers whose expectancy of life is far less than all officers serving in other branches. Furthermore, hazardous duties of the flying officer produce a drain upon the physical resistance that accelerates life and shortens the period of usefulness on the active list. Advantage should be taken in our national defense to the fullest extent of this period during which the Air Corps officer is at his maximum efficiency and in order to do so he must be promoted to the rank which is commensurate with the responsibility of command placed upon him. Of course, it is necessary to provide certain minimum and maximum limits in order that the Air Corps may be kept up to its state of efficiency and still not be burdened with a surplus of rank. These limits again closely follow those that the War Department desire to apply for the whole Army.

Special provision must be made to keep to a minimum the number of nonfliers or those who have lost their usefulness as combat fliers in the Air Corps. This requires special consideration. It is proposed that an officer of the Air Corps shall be permitted to retire after 30 years of service and that each year he is on flying duties shall count double for this purpose. Mention has been made above of the fact that flying officers have their lives accelerated due to the hazardous nature of their occupation. Recognition of this is given in foreign services, and I firmly believe it should be recognized in our Air Corps. Furthermore, in order to help keep the Air Corps an active flying branch of the service, authority should be provided for placing them on the retired list at an earlier age than that now authorized. I have introduced legislation to cover this point.

The Air Corps is at present expanding under a five-year development program authorized by Congress by the act of July 2, 1926. This program provides new units and increases the strength of the Air Corps to sixteen hundred and fifty officers and fifteen thousand enlisted men, but there is no provision for the officers to advance in grade as required for the command of the units organized. Even at present that is a great discrepancy between rank and responsibility of command. The bill I have introduced fits directly into this five-year development program and I believe its provisions are fully justified and will result in a very material increase in the efficiency of the Air Corps and the effectiveness of our national defense.

We had Colonel Lindbergh before our committee last Wednesday, when he discussed aviation questions in general.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield at such time as will suit his convenience?

Mr. FURLOW. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I would like to know if Colonel Lindbergh was interrogated as to his views on a separate air corps or upon having one service to take care of all our aviation activities.

Mr. FURLOW. I will be pleased to answer that question now. At the time I introduced this bill I wrote to Colonel Lindbergh requesting an opinion from him, knowing he had given this matter considerable thought, knowing he had visited many of our camps in America, and knowing he understood flying conditions and knew the necessity of keeping up a high morale within our service. Colonel Lindbergh answered my letter in detail, but asked to be excused from commenting upon the technical features of the bill itself.

Colonel Lindbergh, however, expressed himself clearly, in my opinion, in a statement Wednesday before the House Military Affairs Committee. He said:

> Upon your invitation I am appearing before this committee to make some general observations with regard to Army Air Corps personnel. It is my understanding that there are under consideration in Congress legislative proposals intended to increase the efficiency of the Army Air Corps and directly affecting the commissioned personnel of that important branch.
> In a letter to Congressman FURLOW I stated, "I am earnestly in favor of any legislation that will give to the officers of the Army Air Corps rank and pay that are just compensation for the service rendered and the risk connected with the service. It is clear that this condition does not now exist."
> It is obvious that rank should be an emblem of command and responsibility as well as a reward for service. It has been my observation that officers of the Army Air Corps in many cases have rank quite junior to that expected in the positions they hold.
>
> Active military flying is to-day essentially a young man's occupation, and this means that special considerations enter the problem of securing the maximum benefit from the limited years of active flying service. The rate of promotion is thus influenced.
> Military flying will always be hazardous. Many of the safety factors that apply to commercial aviation must, in war planes, give way to speed, greater fire power, larger bomb loads, and other desirable military characteristics. Combat will require decidedly different maneuvers from commercial flying. Casualties among military flying personnel are consequently relatively high. This great rate of attrition requires special consideration in providing replacements. If a flying officer meets his death, the vacancy should be filled by an Air Corps officer of equal experience.
> Military missions require skill and entail danger that call for pilots of unusual qualities. Adequate reward is necessary to attract and hold the type of officer needed. Especially is this true in the present stage of the rapid growth of the aeronautic industry which doubtless will offer attractive connections to experienced pilots and administrators. It is discouraging for an officer to remain too long in a junior grade—several have already sought civil positions. Undoubtedly morale would be greatly enhanced if officers could see a brighter future in the service.
> I believe our air forces should constitute a first line of defense—they must be ready to take the initiative when danger threatens our Nation—there may be no time permitted for preparation. Efficiency will be gained by proper peace-time provisions to care for the personnel. The expectancy of life for the flying officer is far less than in other occupations, the rate of attrition is high, the strain on the physical resistance from combat flying is excessive, the period of greatest flying efficiency is limited, responsibilities of air officers are heavy, promotion for a large proportion appears to have stagnated—these observations have led me to believe the problem of the air officers is special and requires consideration by itself.

Now, I think gentlemen will agree that, if we consider Colonel Lindbergh's statement under the conditions as they now exist, we can see very easily that Colonel Lindbergh is not satisfied with the present status of the Air Corps.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FURLOW. I will.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am in accord with the gentleman that something ought to be done, and, knowing that he is a member of the Military Affairs Committee, I hope that they will give proper consideration to this subject.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FURLOW. Certainly.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I have asked to interrupt the gentleman in order to make a statement. The proposition for a separate promotion list for the Air Service has been in the past rejected before the Military Affairs Committee. It was also under consideration by the Morrow Commission and rejected after consideration. Personally, and I think I reflect the views of many of the members of the committee, I believe the time has come when that project should be given early consideration, and I believe our committee can be relied upon to give the question of a separate promotion list for the Air Service very serious consideration at this session.

Mr. FURLOW. I am very glad to hear the gentleman from New York say that. I believe the sentiment of the entire committee has changed materially during the past year and a half. That has been due to the fact that we have come more to realize just what aviation means in so far as the question of national defense is concerned, and because we have been made to realize that there are injustices in the promotion list, and that the greater number of these injustices in ratio to the whole list are in the Air Corps Service.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FURLOW. I will.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says. I think the fault does not rest altogether with the Committee on Military Affairs but with Congress as well. But why does not the argument apply with equal force to the Navy Department as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] mentioned a moment ago?

Mr. FURLOW. I am in entire sympathy with any measure that will create greater efficiency in our Air Corps, whether in the Navy or the Army or the Marine Corps.

The bill which I have introduced is as follows:

A bill to increase the efficiency of the Air Corps

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War shall cause to be prepared an Air Corps promotion list on which shall be placed the names of all officers of the Air Corps of the Regular Army below the grade of colonel. The names on this list shall be arranged in the same relative order that they now have on the Army promotion list, and shall be removed from the Army promotion list. All officers commissioned in the Air Corps after the formation of the original Air Corps promotion list shall be placed thereon in accord with length of commissioned service.

SEC. 2. Except as herein provided, Air Corps officers shall be promoted to the grade of first lieutenant when credited with 3 years' commissioned service; to the grade of captain when credited with 7 years' commissioned service; to the grade of major when credited with 12 years' commissioned service; to the grade of lieutenant colonel when credited with 18 years' commissioned service; to the grade of colonel when credited with 25 years' commissioned service: Provided, That the number of Air Corps officers in the grade of colonel shall not be less than 4 per cent nor more than 6 per cent, and the number in the grade of lieutenant colonel shall not be less than 5 per cent nor more than 7 per cent of the total number of officers on the Air Corps promotion list, and the aggregate number of Air Corps officers in the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major shall not be less than 26 per cent nor more than 40 per cent of the total number of officers on the Air Corps promotion list, and in so far as necessary to maintain said minimum percentages, Air Corps officers of less than the required years of commissioned service shall be promoted to the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major, and only in so far as their promotion will not cause said maximum percentages to be exceeded shall officers who have completed the prescribed years of commissioned service be promoted to the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major.

SEC. 3. When an officer of the Air Corps has served 30 years either as an officer or soldier he shall, if he make application therefor to the President, be retired from active service and placed on the retired list: Provided, That each year of flying service shall be computed as two years of active service. Air Corps flying officers may be retired from active service and placed on the retired list upon reaching the age of 54 years. Officers of the Air Corps who become physically disqualified for all types of flying shall be eligible for retirement.

SEC. 4. All laws or parts of laws, in so far as they may be inconsistent herewith or in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

I know that the Members of Congress are interested in this important question and are studying it.

Mr. McCLINTIC. If the Committee on Military Affairs can bring about the right kind of legislation, which will offer proper inducement to aviators in the Army, then those in the Navy who are dissatisfied with the Navy service can probably be transferred over to the Army, and eventually the Naval Committee will be compelled to report some kind of legislation for the aviators in the Navy that will be fair and just.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it may be timely now to state that it is very important that both the Army and the Navy aviation cooperate in every possible way with civil aviation. At New York we have Mitchel Field, which is an Army station. The relations existing between the Army aviators at Mitchel Field and the civilian flyers is most cordial. Every civilian flyer knows that he will always get a hearty welcome at Mitchel Field. At Miller Field, on Staten Island, we have the New York National Guard. They have equipment and personnel which, I dare say, compares very favorably with that of any National Guard aviation organization in the country. But this Miller Field is part of a military reservation. There is one company of tanks stationed there, which is in command of a lieutenant colonel who does not understand aviation, and who seemingly is not in sympathy with it. He has constituted himself a sort of traffic cop, in so far as civilian flyers are concerned.

The other day Mr. Kahn, son of Mr. Otto Kahn, landed at Miller Field in order to go to the Bellanca factory, presumably to get a part for his plane. While he was gone, this pinhead colonel went to the plane and attached a tag to it on which was written:

By whose authority did you land here? See me immediately on your return.

I have called this matter to the attention of the Secretary of War. That is certainly a stupid viewpoint to take in this age. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I will read a letter which I have sent to the Secretary of War. It contains all of the facts. I am hopeful that this interference and discourtesy will not be repeated at Miller Field. I want to say that I do not believe such stupid conduct meets with the approval of the department:

MARCH 23, 1928.

Hon. DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am sure that it is your desire and the policy of your department to extend every possible courtesy to civilian flyers. In fact, Mitchel Field is known the world over for its courtesy and willingness to cooperate at all times and be of assistance to visiting planes or planes landing in an emergency. I believe that is true in every Army air field throughout the continent. It is therefore with a great deal of distress that I am compelled to call your attention to the conduct of the commanding officer at Miller Field, Staten Island, N. Y. As you know, part of the military reservation at Miller Field has been assigned to the New York National Guard. The guard has a splendid organization. I am certain that it compares favorably with any guard organization in the United States. They fly constantly. It is composed of a splendid set of men. All of their equipment is in splendid condition, and they have made hosts of friends all through the United States, not only for the guard aviation but also for the Army. The military contingent consists of a tank company and it is under the command of a lieutenant colonel, a Colonel Upham, I believe. This lieutenant colonel, whoever he may be, has certainly displayed a narrow-minded attitude with an extraordinary amount of arrogance. He knows nothing about aviation, but that makes no difference, for the simple reason that he has nothing to do with aviation. He has taken upon himself to assume command of the flying field and the personnel of the National Guard. He has issued orders that private planes can not land on the field without first obtaining permission from him. Just how a plane in distress flying over Staten Island would get in communication with him I do not know. It has been customary for planes from the Bellanca Co. to land at Miller Field, and the relation between Mr. Giuseppe Bellanca and his factory and Miller Field is most friendly and cordial.

A few days ago a Mr. Kahn landed his Bellanca plane at Miller Field and motored over to the factory. While he was away the colonel discovered this plane on the field and tied a tag on the plane inquiring who had given authority for the plane to land and for the owner of the plane to report to him immediately. If this is not a dumb pinhead thing for one who holds a colonel commission to do, I don't know what is.

The other day one of the National Guard officers was flying and made a landing not to the pleasure of the colonel. Again I repeat the colonel has absolutely nothing to do with the flying, and the colonel "ordered" the man from flying for a certain specified time. It so happened that this National Guard officer took sick and had to go to the hospital, which prevented a real test of this colonel trying to give orders that he has no right to give.

Miller Field, as you know, is located at the lower end of Staten Island and it may very often happen that civilian planes may be forced to land there. It is also natural for civilian planes to visit the field and many times distinguished national and foreign flyers at the invitation of the National Guard, use the field. Commander Byrd at one time landed there with his plane, Commander DePinedo assembled a new plane at that field. Fortunately at the time the present stupid commanding officer was not in charge.

Incidentally I desire to point out that if this officer would attend to his own duties properly he would have enough to keep him busy without interfering with the splendid National Guard organization.

He has about 115 enlisted men and about 10 officers to look after these 115 men. The equipment is all run down. I venture to state that not one-third of the tanks can be taken out and used.

It is my request that you investigate the conduct of this officer and that he be instructed not to make a fool of himself, to refrain from interfering with the National Guard and to let the officers of the National Guard organization, to whom the field has been assigned, decide as to the rules of the field and who should land there.

I trust you will give this matter your immediate attention because the conduct of this fool officer is causing a great deal of friction and annoyance.

Sincerely,

F. LAGUARDIA.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat amused at the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. UPDIKE] on this question of Nicaragua. When the question first came up we were told that the troops were in Nicaragua on account of the Monroe doctrine. It seems now that the reason has shifted around somewhat, and we are told that the troops are there because we have been invited there by the good people of Nicaragua. Of course, I shall not attempt to analyse the word "good" in this respect, but I do want to know when it happened that the taxpayers of this country should pay their good money and the parents of this country should give their sons in order to go down and keep order in anybody's country just because we were invited down there by some so-called "good" people. That is a new doctrine to me. I first thought they were going to stand on the Monroe doctrine, and it is certain we have made a very cordial acceptance of the invitation when we find 15 of our war vessels in the waters of Nicaragua, and over 3,000 of our marines down there. Surely we accepted their hospitality in a lavish manner.

This is a very peculiar situation. Nobody knows how we got in there, and now we are going to supervise the election down there. Won't we have a fine job on our hands if we undertake to go down into every country that has some little internal troubles in order to see that they have a fair election? Our forefathers, when they founded this country, labored under the belief that people who were oppressed by any form of government had the right to fight for their liberty. No doubt the Tories in this country, who were very prosperous and very aristocratic people, would have been called the "good" people of America if they had invited the Germans to come over here to keep the rest of us from getting our liberty and freedom.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. KENT. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects to 3,000 marines being placed in Nicaragua to supervise elections. Would it not be better to take the 100 election "experts" who were offered to the Vare-Wilson committee by Mr. WILLIAM S. VARE to supervise the Vare-Wilson contest being carried on now in the Senate Office Building? Does not the gentleman think that 100 election "experts" from south Philadelphia would be able to properly supervise an election in Nicaragua?

Mr. MCKEOWN. While I admit that these "experts" have shown considerable proficiency in Philadelphia, yet I doubt if we need to send anybody down to another country in order to supervise their elections.

Mr. UPDIKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. UPDIKE. Surely the gentleman from Oklahoma would not say that they did not do good work in Haiti and Santo Domingo and Cuba?

Mr. MCKEOWN. I am just coming to that. Yes; we did good work there, and the taxpayers of this country have paid for that good work. Why should we keep up the good work just because we are asked to come in and do it?

Mr. UPDIKE. And we did that under a Democratic administration and under a Democratic President.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes; during the war, in order to protect the canal. That is the reason we were down there.

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman asks why we should be down there. Would not the gentleman rather have American marines down there than English or French or Italian marines?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Oh, well, I will say this to the gentleman: If the gentleman thinks that America has to go around all over the world to supervise the little disputes and troubles that occur he has a wrong conception of the policy and the duty of the United States Government. The United States Government has been setting an example to those people, saying, "You are entitled to freedom," and here you have marines down there to supervise the election. I want to know if anybody can give us any information as to whether Sandino has been promised the right to vote down there in the election?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. MCKEOWN. I want to know whether arrangements have been made for allowing those fellows who are non persona grata down there to vote. Will they have a chance to vote, or will they simply be frightened off in the bushes and not have a chance to come up and vote?

Mr. UPDIKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. UPDIKE. Does the gentleman think Sandino would say "Amen" to sending civilians down there to protect lives?

Mr. MCKEOWN. I do not know anything about that. It is a fact that you have 3,000 marines in Nicaragua, without the authority of an act of Congress, to supervise the election, and you have not issued a proclamation giving assurance to those fellows of a chance to vote. What chance has Sandino got to vote when the marines are after him?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. In connection with the question asked by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS], I wish to say that British corporations have maintained a police force in the close vicinity of the canal down at Panama, and they have corporations down there that concern themselves sometimes with the political affairs of Panama, and the State Department has not said a word about it.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. At one time, when Grover Cleveland was President, England threatened that she would interfere in Venezuela, and when Theodore Roosevelt was President Germany threatened to intervene in Central America, and those two great Presidents asserted our determination to maintain the Monroe doctrine, and both Britain and Germany yielded without the exercise of military power or an expedition of marines. Our naval and military strength was then much inferior to our present strength, but our mandate had the effect of preventing any undesirable interference by foreign power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, to what extent does the gentleman wish to extend?

Mr. MCKEOWN. To the extent of showing that Sandino differs from President Coolidge, because Sandino chooses to run. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, on the subject of our parcel-post convention with Cuba, I have had certain correspondence with Hon. Hugo Hartenstein, president of the American Chamber of Commerce of Cuba. Mr. Hartenstein has printed in pamplet form what purports to be copies of "Cablegram and letters exchanged between the Hon. H. T. RAINEY and the American Chamber of Commerce of Cuba." His pamphlet is now being extensively circulated. The pamphlet does not contain all my correspondence with Mr. Hartenstein. He has omitted my letter of March 6, 1928, in reply to his letter to me of March 2, 1928. Under the permission granted me, I am printing herewith my complete correspondence with Mr. Hartenstein, including his cablegram and all his letters to me and all of my letters to him on the subject.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES-CUBAN PARCEL POST CONVENTION—CABLEGRAM AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN THE HON. H. T. RAINEY AND THE AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF CUBA

FEBRUARY 21, 1928.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINBY,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

If press quotes you correctly concerning H. R. 9195, your statements before Rules Committee misleading and absolutely contrary to facts. Can positively assure you Cuban Government will not maintain modus vivendi effective after March 1. No embargo exists against American cigarettes entering Cuba, merely a misunderstanding as to interpretation of new customs tariff which, when brought to President's attention by this chamber, was, through presidential decree, adjusted in accordance with American chamber's ideas of equity. Contrary to your alleged statement there has been absolutely no increase in duties on American cigarettes imported into Cuba. United States-Cuban Parcel Post Convention can not be extended through presidential proclamation, as stated by you, but requires the consent of both countries as contracting parties, with sanction of Cuban Senate. Your implication that the removal of tobacco restriction on mail shipments, in lots less than three thousand, into United States would destroy American tobacco industry simply ridiculous, because Cuba's total exports of cigars to all countries are less than 1½ per cent of total United States production of cigars, of which less than one-half of 1 per cent are exported to the United States. There has been unjust discrimination against Cuba for more than 23 years, due to tobacco restriction clause in parcel-post exchange, permitting all mailable products entry into Cuba but excluding Cuba's only mailable product, tobacco, entering United States. Our country prides itself on its fair dealing with Pan American countries, why not give proof thereof in this instance. Cuba demonstrated wonderful spirit of friendliness toward United States during recent Pan American conference which deserves reciprocal consideration.

HUGO HARTENSTEIN,

President the American Chamber of Commerce of Cuba.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 22, 1928.

Hon. HUGO HARTENSTEIN,

President American Chamber of Commerce, Habana, Cuba.

MY DEAR MR. HARTENSTEIN: I am just in receipt of your telegram in the matter of my statements before the Rules Committee, in connection with the Cuban parcel-post matter. I note your suggestion that my statements "are absolutely contrary to the facts." In spite of the position you take, I still adhere to everything I said before the Rules Committee.

I am wondering if you are sending much information to the United States as evasive as your telegram to me. I did not say that Cuba has imposed an import tax on our cigarettes. I did say that she imposed a tax on our manufactured tobacco so large as to make it an embargo. I notice that in your evasive telegram you do not admit this. Your statement that the removal of the parcel-post agreement would not affect the cigar industry in the United States on account of the small present production of cigars in Cuba for exportation to the United States, permit me to say, is exceedingly ridiculous, and this kind of an argument is quite unworthy of the important position you occupy.

We are importing every year now from Cuba of cigar leaf tobacco alone 27,000,000 pounds. The proposition for which you stand would simply mean that a large part of this importation would come in the shape of manufactured cigars. I do not think Cuba will suspend her present parcel post convention with us for a very long period of time, in spite of the encouragement she is evidently receiving from large industries in the United States who are quite willing to destroy our cigar industry in order to carry on the present insignificant and unimportant parcel-post shipments to Cuba. We would not lose much in the United States if we lost our entire parcel-post business with Cuba, but we would lose a tremendous amount if our great cigar industry in the United States, in its various ramifications, were subjected to the dangers involved in this bill. I know, from personal observation, what is happening in islands adjacent to Cuba.

Under our administration, in Haiti, we are teaching them to raise tobacco. I have smoked the cigars they make there. They are just as good as the Cuban cigars and much better than our cigars. There are numerous islands very near Cuba which can produce as good tobacco as Cuba produces and this supply is easily accessible to Cuban manufacturers of cigars. If we throw open our markets to Cuban cigars, we will be building up a tremendous industry in Cuba and adjacent islands, which will practically destroy our own industry in the United States.

I do not regret that in this matter I can not agree with you. I shall continue the fight to the best of my ability for this great American industry and your evasive and misleading telegram will not have the slightest effect upon the fight I expect to continue making against the proposition for which you stand so enthusiastically.

The American Chamber of Commerce in Cuba, it seems to me, ought to stand for American industries and not for those propositions which would destroy one of our greatest industries. Your telegram has had the effect of convincing me of one thing I assure you; it has convinced me that the United States would be much better off if the American Chamber of Commerce in Cuba could be persuaded to quit functioning.

The threat of the director of posts of Cuba, if carried out, will injure only Cuba. For your information, may I quote from the hearings and tell you what it is. "And lastly, that there be no mistake as to our future attitude. We will abrogate both the parcel-post convention and the mail convention if we fail to get a just recognition of our rights." Do you contend that Cuba is going to do that and sever all communication by mail with the United States? She can not abrogate under her position a part of her 1903 convention. If she abrogates it, she must abrogate it in its entirety, and this will have the effect of cutting off all her mail relations with us, including letters and first-class mail matter, and this is what her director says they will do.

The American Chamber of Commerce, under your leadership, could render a real service to the United States by attempting to call the attention of the Cuban authorities to the absurd situation in which they will place themselves if they carry out this threat.

I do not know what is back of all this, but I think I know and I would not be at all surprised if your organization were not a party to it.

I thank you for taking so much trouble to send me such a long telegram, and I assure you I appreciate it. I am glad to have it. It will help me very much in the fight I am making. It enables me to call attention to the unfair attitude your organization occupies with reference to a great American industry and to your evident willingness and even anxiety to do what you can to build up an industry in Cuba which would have the effect of further injuring the agricultural industry in the United States and which will also have such a disastrous effect upon our great cigar industry.

Very truly yours,

HENRY T. RAINEY.

THE AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF CUBA,
Habana, March 2, 1928.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your courtesy of February 22 in reply to my cablegram of February 21 is very interesting. My acknowledgement has been delayed only by my desire to give due and fair consideration to the points brought out by you so that my reply would be helpful to you in eliminating any possible misunderstanding as to the attitude of this chamber toward the parcel-post situation and also so that you might know the primary objects and purposes for which this chamber stands.

With your permission we will clear the second point first by quoting from our constitution, article 1, as follows: "The particular objects and purposes for which this association—American Chamber of Commerce of Cuba—is formed are these": "To promote trade and commerce between the United States of America and the Republic of Cuba," etc.

It seems absolutely necessary for us to state, that since the foundation of our chamber on August 16, 1919, we have endeavored at all times to maintain the high standards of conduct laid down by its founders and to carry out the objects and purposes as set forth in our constitution, always with a view toward the best interests of both nations, believing that the principles of equity and justice claimed as attributes of our American Nation, should prevail in all our endeavors. Whether or not we have succeeded in our undertakings, is for our public to decide.

As to the policy of this chamber in connection with the parcel-post situation, may we briefly review our position?

Some three years ago, after a careful study of the general mails convention of 1903 and the legislation which caused the nonreciprocal operation thereof, we were convinced that, in justification of the objects and purposes of our constitution, we should cooperate with the Post Office Departments of both the United States and Cuba for the purpose of securing the necessary legislation through the American Congress to place the parcel-post exchange on a just and equitable basis.

The entire difficulty was due to the effect of section 2804 of the Revised Statutes, which prohibits the entry of imported cigars in quantities less than 3,000. This prohibition forms a part of the tariff act of July 28, 1866.

The general mails convention of 1903 entered into by the contracting parties—the United States and Cuban Post Office Departments—became practically inoperative in so far as Cuba was concerned from the very moment of its inception, due to the clause cited above, since practically Cuba's only mailable product—cigars—could not be mailed to the States, whereas the United States received the full benefit of the parcel-post exchange, as there were no restrictions on any of her commodities. This situation was created in the face of the express statement embodied in the general mails convention with Cuba that "articles of every kind or nature which are admitted to domestic mails of each country" should be admitted and exchanged between the two countries.

As a further proof of the good will which Cuba has always displayed toward the United States and at the special request of the United States Post Office Department a provisional parcel-post convention was arranged and signed between the Cuban and the United States Post Office Departments on October 31, 1925, whereby a weight limit increase to 11 pounds in mailable packages was arranged. This provisional convention was to remain operative during a period of 18 months, but contained a special proviso reserving to Cuba the right to abrogate at the expiration of that period if during that time no legislative remedy was enacted by our Congress to make the convention reciprocal to both countries by the elimination of the restriction against tobacco imported by mail into the United States.

The term of the provisional convention having elapsed and no action having been taken by the American Congress, Cuba decided to use her prerogative and abrogate the temporary convention, but at the special insistence of the American Government, including the personal request of President Coolidge, an extension of time was granted by Cuba through a "modus vivendi" based on the assurance of our Government that the corrective legislation would be urged. Cuba agreed to this as additional proof of her desire to maintain the most cordial postal relations with our country.

Again the people and the executives of the United States as well as the people and executives of Cuba have been disappointed by the failure of Congress to comply with what seemed to be nothing more or less than its duty—the enactment into law of H. R. 9195. Is it not fair to state that Cuba and her representatives are free from blame through the discontinuance of what to Americans is a valuable asset, the parcel-post convention?

Having firmly fixed in our minds that our cause was just, we initiated a campaign throughout the various States of the Union, urging the necessity of legislation to counteract that portion of the tariff act of 1866 which did not permit our Postal Department to meet its moral obligation with the Cuban Government as outlined in the convention.

We have not deviated from our fixed policy favoring such remedial legislation, this policy having been predicated on the deep conviction that a great, although no doubt unintentional, injustice had been done to Cuba and that it was our duty, as loyal citizens of the United States, to place the facts of the case before our legislators at Washington, in the belief that the corrective legislation would be enacted.

We must take serious exception to your statement that it is our evident willingness and even anxiety to do what we can to build up an industry in Cuba which will have the effect of further injuring agricultural industries in the United States and which would also have a disastrous effect upon, or as you say "destroy" the great American cigar industry. The facts are entirely contrary to your contention. First, Cuba's exports of cigars to all countries are about 1½ per cent of the total production of cigars in the United States, of which less than one-half of 1 per cent are exported to the United States.

Second. Assuming that your statement, "We are importing every year now from Cuba of cigar leaf tobacco alone 27,000,000 pounds," is correct (our records show the quantity to be approximately 21,000,000 pounds), we can not agree that a large part of this importation would come in the shape of manufactured cigars, provided, of course, that the tobacco restriction clause were lifted through legislation.

You apparently do not realize that there is absolutely no affiliation between the growers of export leaf tobacco and the manufacturers of the universally known Habana-made cigars. They are two separate and distinct industries having nothing in common, and it is self-evident, therefore, that your fear is unfounded.

You state that tobacco as good as Cuba produces is available in numerous islands very near to Cuba, and that this is easily accessible to Cuban manufacturers of cigars. Geographically "easily accessible," possibly, but how much cigar leaf tobacco do you suppose would ever be imported into Cuba in the face of an import duty of $5 per pound; and even though it were imported, can you believe that the cigars produced therefrom, at the consequent high cost of production, would be salable in a highly competitive market like that of the United States?

It hardly seems worth while to discuss the merits of Haitian tobacco, since were it of such excellent quality as to be comparable with that of Cuban-grown tobacco, it is logical to assume that the United States tobacco industry would prefer it and purchase it. You full well know that Haitian tobacco is not being shipped to the United States.

While it is possible that you did not intend to say that Cuba had imposed an import tax on cigarettes so large as to make it an embargo, nevertheless all available records of your statements before the Rules Committee show that your comments were directed against American cigarettes entering Cuba, and no reference was made therein to manufactured tobacco. Let me quote your remarks from these records in our own justification: "In other words, we are dealing with an embargo which only affects the United States, since it is we who export 99 per cent of the cigarettes which go to Cuba." We repeat, no embargo exists against American cigarettes entering Cuba, nor is there a prohibitive duty against them which is not fairly comparable with existing customs tariff in the United States affecting foreign cigarettes.

Certain reports emanating from the United States lead one to believe that it is the intent to enter Cuban cigars into the United States without the payment of duty. Note particularly that there is no desire on the part of the Cuban postal officials nor on our part to introduce Cuban cigars through the mails into the United States without payment of full duty, such as would be paid were cigars shipped in bulk. In other words, H. R. 9195 has absolutely nothing to do with customs tariff, and we want to stress this point particularly to counteract all insinuations to the contrary.

Ere this reaches you, you will have learned that you are mistaken in stating that Cuba would not abrogate her present parcels-post convention, since the press published the fact that no further parcels-post matter would be received for mailing to Cuba from the United States nor vice versa. You are also incorrect in stating that the abrogation of the parcels-post convention would mean the severing of all communication by mail with the United States. If you will read the orders issued by your own Post Office Department, you will be convinced that there is nothing to your statement of "cutting off all her mail relations with us." There still remains the universal postal union, which permits of postal exchange where no special convention exists, so that Cuba will not remain "incomunicado" in any sense.

Whether or not you approve of H. R. 9195, you must, as a fair-minded American, consider the moral and ethical question involved. A negotiation consummated between two friendly nations, entirely reciprocal and fair in its wording, can not be fulfilled because of existing and almost forgotten legislation in one of the two contracting countries—the United States. As our country is a most enthusiastic exponent of Pan Americanism, would you desire to be placed in a position of making excuses for our Government which might rightfully be accused of taking advantage of this situation if no attempt were made to set the matter right?

Finally, we would deeply appreciate further details in connection with the penultimate paragraph of your letter, as we are entirely at a loss to understand your meaning.

Very sincerely yours,

HUGO HARTENSTEIN,
President the American Chamber of Commerce of Cuba.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1928.

Hon. HUGO HARTENSTEIN,
President American Chamber of Commerce of Cuba,
Habana, Cuba.

MY DEAR MR. HARTENSTEIN: I am just in receipt of your letter of March 2, which I have carefully read and which does not in any way change the opinions I have already expressed before the committees as to our parcel post convention with Cuba.

The Congress of the United States is a representative body and exists under the Constitution for the very purpose of enacting laws like the law of 1866. No bureau of the Government and no department of the Government has a right to expect that at its demand Congress will ever enact a law repealing the law of 1866.

The general mails convention with Cuba, which attempts to admit to the mails "articles of every kind or nature which are admitted to domestic mails of each country," is absolutely unauthorized under existing law in the United States, so far as cigars are concerned. The Post Office Department has no right to assume that Members of Congress, under their oaths, will enact legislation so injurious as the repeal of the act of 1866 would be in order to comply with an unauthorized mail convention entered into by the Post Office Department of this country with Cuba.

I do not agree with you at all that the people of the United States are disappointed by the failure of Congress to repeal the act of 1866. Information I am receiving, I assure you, is quite to the contrary. Members of Congress represent the States from which they are elected—not the Republic of Cuba.

It is absolutely self-evident that the position taken by the American chamber of commerce in Cuba will greatly injure an important agricultural industry in the United States. Representatives of that industry think that your policy would injure it, and it is perfectly apparent to me that it would.

The hearings before the Ways and Means Committee show our importations of leaf tobacco from Cuba to be 27,000,000 pounds, but whether it is 27,000,000 or 21,000,000, as you suggest, is immaterial. The amount is enormous, and a large portion of it would come in the shape of manufactured cigars if your proposition went through.

You are evidently right about your statement that there is no affiliation between the growers of leaf tobacco in Cuba and manufacturers of cigars. There is, however, just as much affiliation between them as there is between the growers of wheat in the United States and the manufacturing millers; and, of course, cigar manufacturers in Cuba purchase their supplies of tobacco in Cuba and manufacture the raw material into cigars there, and every cigar they can send to the United States would displace an American cigar manufactured in part of Cuban tobacco, and many of our cigars, are, of course, manufactured in part of Cuban tobacco. Under the arrangement you and your organization stand for, less leaf tobacco and more cigars would reach the United States, and the more cigars reaching the United States from Cuba, the less number of cigar makers would be required in the United States, etc.

Whenever Cuba manufactures cigars to take up her own supply of leaf tobacco, she can bring leaf tobacco just as good as Cuban tobacco from the adjacent islands. This is perfectly apparent and the new industry you propose to start in Cuba would have this effect. Therefore, tropical tobacco like the Cuban tobacco, would be available to Cuban cigar factories in absolutely unlimited quantities. The import duty you mention can be removed in a very short time indeed whenever the industry in Cuba might require its removal.

My comments were not directed "against American cigarettes entering Cuba," and I did limit my remarks to manufactured tobacco. I am inclosing a copy of the hearings before the Rules Committee on the parcel post bill and call attention to the marked portions on page 23 of the hearings.

There is not the slightest contention here that it is the intention to enter Cuban cigars into the United States without the payment of duty. The duty can be still paid and by eliminating profits between the manufacturer and the consumer a very large differential indeed would exist in favor of Cuban cigars. I call attention to my expression on this subject on page 26 of the printed hearings.

The Cuban parcel post bill very materially had to do with the customs tariff. A package of cigars coming from Cuba under the proposed bill need not even go to a bonded warehouse. Under the proposed bill, arrangements could be made by the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department, so that the internal-revenue tax and the tariff tax, and the postage could be completely prepaid and the package could be sent directly to the purchaser.

What I said was that Cuba would not for a very long time suspend parcel-post arrangements with the United States, and I do not think she will. She will certainly not do it unless she is encouraged by your organization to do it by holding out to her the hope that Congress will at some time in the future repeal the law of 1866, in order to restore our parcel-post trade with Cuba. You will be performing a great service indeed, which you have not yet done in this matter, if you impress upon the Cubans the fact that Congress will not repeal the act of 1866. What I meant to say is that you will render a great service to Cuba—not to the United States. Our parcel-post trade with Cuba is extremely negligible and can be carried on through the medium of the express companies with but slight additional charges.

I note your desire for further details in connection with some paragraph of my letter which you call the "penultimate" paragraph. Further details are entirely unnecessary at the present time, inasmuch as the bill you so enthusiastically sponsor seems to be entirely dead. If you succeed in reviving it again it may be necessary for me to carry on some further investigations and make the result of all my investigations public. Inasmuch as the matter is now disposed of and dead, so far as the United States is concerned, I will consider it unnecessary to continue further our correspondence.

Very truly yours,

HENRY T. RAINEY.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, when I took the oath of office as a Member of Congress on May 19, 1919, nearly nine years ago, it seemed certain that farm relief legislation would be passed in just a few days. The beautiful rainbow of farm relief was just ahead. I could almost reach it. It has, rainbow like, moved just ahead of us. As ever, to-day it is just ahead. I have been somewhat disillusioned and now realize that there is a bitter fight to be waged if the farmers are to get any real relief. Oh! I know we pass thousands of bills that help the farmer and other people slightly, but I want a bill putting the farmer on a parity with other folks.

Some say nothing can be done for the farmer. Others say, let him alone and he will work out his own problems. He could probably have worked out his own problems if Congress had not, by discriminatory and unjust laws, tied him hand and foot and delivered him into the hands of his enemies. The farmers can lock their stables against the horse thief, guard their cattle against the cow thief, protect by force their cotton and corn against the midnight burglar, and drive from their henhouse the chicken thief, but they are as helpless as "babes in the woods" against unjust tariffs, unfair public utility laws, despotic economic pressure of the unrestrained profiteer and the mass of discriminatory laws giving big wealth a strangle hold on the farmers and the common people of the Nation.

There is no real help for the farmer unless Congress comes to the rescue. I know Congress can absolutely solve this great problem, but I very much fear it will not be solved at this session. Too many Members of Congress are not for real farm relief, and many who are for sure-enough farm relief do not seriously study this great problem. A few days ago I told a Member of Congress I was giving practically all my time to the study of farm-relief legislation and he said:

LANKFORD, you are simply foolish to worry yourself studying all the farm bills; why not do as I do? I am for the farmer and always vote for every farm bill that comes up. I let the committee report the bill and then I vote.

Mr. Chairman, I could not agree with this Member. He can not vote for farm relief unless he studies the various bills. There are farm relief bills and then there are more farm relief bills. Some are good and many are bad. You can not judge a pill by its looks and you can not judge a bill by its name. You must study and know the contents or you will help give the farmer something to destroy him rather than to help him.

As a lawyer for a fee, I worked until midnight many a night to save from destruction a human being charged with a crime. Now, as a Member of Congress, employed not by one man charged with a crime, but as the selected servant of over a quarter of a million innocent men and women and children, I am working with all my God-given powers to save my folks and the farmers of the Nation from ultimate destruction.

I am sure the farmers' problems can be solved by legislation, and I am equally sure the solution is by giving them the same rights accorded other businesses and enterprises. I have repeatedly told the Congress how this can be accomplished by my bill—H. R. 77—or some similar bill. Many of the pending bills may help the farmer temporarily, just as a dose of morphine may help a fellow for a few minutes, but it does not last long enough. My bill—H. R. 77—consists of 28 printed pages, containing 35 sections and could not be read, much less explained in detail in the time now allotted to me. The bill, though, is very simple in its terms and the plan therein provided is equally simple.

Using cotton as an illustration, it sets up means whereby the farmer could draw about 20 to 25 cents per pound on his cotton, provided the larger part of the farmers in the country approved the plan. The farmers drawing this amount in cash would not have to sell, and under their contract there would only be put on the market so much cotton as there was demand for at 25 cents per pound or better. The price would be stabilized at 25 cents or above. The loans would be safe. The farmers' finance corporation set up by the bill could not lose. The farmer could not lose, and for once could name the price of his products within reasonable bounds, and hence fix a reasonable profit.

My plan, by mutual contract entered into by the farmers, would solve the only great farm problem, to wit, that of proper control of the cotton offered for sale from time to time. Production would also be controlled, but an overproduction would not force prices down for the overplus would be held off the market until there was demand for it of 25 cents per pound or better.

The farmers could afford to hold a 400-pound bale of cotton with a loan on it of $100 at 4 per cent interest, never to come due until his cotton is sold for enough to pay the loan and interest in full, all storage and other charges, with an additional amount to the farmer.

That is exactly what my bill would authorize. Please study the bill and you will be driven to the conclusion that it is absolutely sound and will stabilize the price of basic agricultural commodities at the average price of such commodities. The price could go higher, but could not fall below the stabilized minimum.

All the export corporation bills are fatally objectionable in that they provide no sufficient control of marketing and production, and hence have failure written across their pages. They do not help the individual farmer; only add another large speculator to the already overswollen list and very probably will do the farmer more harm than good.

Genuine farm relief can only be obtained by the farmers, as free men, acting by mutual contracts, protecting each other and the Government against loss in exchange for the protection of each other and the Government. There never was a fairer reciprocity than that proposed by my bill. It will enable the farmers absolutely to control their own affairs and name, within reason, their own prices.

"Ay, there's the rub." My bill will help the farmers to fix and receive a better price for their products. That is why I favor it and why many others oppose it. So much has been said about price fixing until I think it well to make a few observations along that line at this time.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we have heard arguments pro and con on the tariff. The tariff is good and bad. It is good for those that it enriches and it is bad for those it helps to rob. It can not be fair unless by some means it gives back to the party robbed every dollar taken from him.

If every dollar taken from the consumer as a result of the tariff is returned to the consumer, then the consumer is not injured; and, of course, if the consumer gets back not only that which has been taken from him but an additional sum, then the tariff is good for him. The trouble, though, is to prove how all that is plundered from the public is returned to the public. In fact, if there was a provision in the tariff law which had the effect of making the manufacturer pass on to the consumer or to the laborers of the country all that the manufacturers get as a result of the tariff, then the manufacturer would not at all want the tariff.

High-tariff advocates are forced to try and prove that even though the manufacturers eat the public's cake that still the public has its cake.

High tariff has been the means by which millions of the common folks have been deprived of that which is justly theirs. My position on the tariff is easily stated. I object to and fight with all my power the high tariff which is placed on every blessed thing which my people buy, and then I get as high a tariff as possible on what they sell to offset the damage about to be done by the tariff on the manufactured article needed by my people. It is almost impossible to write a high tariff bill which will be fair to my people. Heretofore in all high tariff bills the manufacturer has always received the advantage.

Only a day or two ago some one on this floor shouted that high tariff was the means of maintaining a high standard of wages for the laboring men of this country. Oh, labor! labor! how many crimes are committed in thy name? I am for the laboring man, but I favor legislating for him and the farmers of the Nation directly and not by circuity. I am not in favor of turning money over to the big rich on the theory that enough will ooze through the hands of the millionaires of the country for the common folks. I do not believe in giving Dives all the good things of life on the theory that the crumbs from his table will be sufficient for poor, starving Lazarus. It is believed by many that drippings from the hands of the big manufacturers are all sufficient for the laborers of the Nation, and that the farmers, who feed all and clothe all, should be content with the husk of the profiteering swine of the country.

Why do not we legislate for the common folks directly?

We legislate here for the corporate interests, for the big rich, for the railroads, for the bankers, for the bondholders, and for every profiteer of the country, and not for the farmers. There are bureaus and agencies everywhere to fix high prices in behalf of all but the farmers of the country.

Nearly every law enacted here, either directly or indirectly, fixes prices of articles which the farmers must buy, and fixes those prices very, very high.

There rise up now those that bitterly protest against the farmers and their friends organizing into blocs in an effort to get some relief for the farmers of the Nation. Well, the big, rich manufacturers, railroad men, and bankers have had blocs here from the beginning of the Government, and we have heard no protest about those blocs. The objection seems to be only brought forth when the farmers seek some sort of relief.

They want the farmers not to complain while they are being robbed and while prices are being fixed high on what they buy and low on what they sell.

Those who oppose most bitterly price fixing in behalf of the farmers are most resolute in their belief in price fixing in destruction of the farmer.

People who have argued all their lives for high price fixing of all the farmer buys and for low price fixing of all he sells in some way pretend to forget their past stand on price fixing and now are shouting their utter opposition to price fixing when it is even suggested that a measure may remotely assist the farmer in getting better prices for what he sells or may help him get at less prices fertilizers or other commodities which he sorely needs.

Now they declare at the top of their voices their opposition to price fixing. Let us keep the record straight. They are only opposed to anything that may assist in price fixing in behalf of the farmer. They are in favor of price fixing for themselves and for their crowd of profiteers.

They favor price fixing through a profiteer's tariff of all the farmer buys, but oppose everything that tends to fix reasonable prices on what the farmer sells.

They favor price fixing of officials' salaries, of Cabinet officers' services, and, in fact, of all governmental activities, and oppose price fixing at a reasonable rate of the sweat on the farmers' faces.

They favor high price fixing for the railroads and other transportation companies when they haul the farmer and his family, but oppose price fixing for the labor of those same farmers and their loved ones when they are struggling for existence.

They favor high price fixing for the hauling by the corporations of the products of the farm, but oppose reasonable price fixing for the production of those same commodities.

They favor high price fixing for the big banks of the Nation and are willing to give millions and even billions to foreign governments at the behest of the international bankers in order to do the price fixing act for the very rich, but oppose price fixing in behalf of the poor and in behalf of the common folks of the country.

They favor price fixing for those who sit in the cushioned seat of the speculator and the profiteer and oppose price fixing for those who trudge with the worn and bleeding feet of the toiler and the producer.

They favor and are urging the practical giving of Muscle Shoals to the corporate interests so as to allow and help the power companies and fertilizer trusts fix high prices on fertilizers and on actual necessaries of the farmer, and so as to prevent the farmer from getting fertilizers at a fair rate and the common people from getting electric power at a reasonable price.

They favor fixing the grip of the corporate interests on the throats of the common people and favor depriving the people of even a decent chance to complain.

They favor that price fixing which makes heavy the lash on the backs of the farmer and his children and are opposed to a price fixing which would assist them in warding off the cruel blows with their bare and bleeding hands.

Those who are now yelling against price fixing in behalf of the farmers say with one accord, "Let the law of supply and demand control." What they mean by this law is to let the farmer do the supplying and let the profiteer do the demanding.

They mean, let the farmers do the supplying of the labor and let them do the demanding of the fruits of that toil. They mean, let the farmers do the supplying of the food and clothing of the world and let the profiteers do the demanding of unconscionable profits from all that the farmer produces and from all that he buys.

They mean, let the farmers of the Nation supply themselves, their wives, and children to be offered on the profiteer's altar of greed and let the profiteer demand and receive as a result of that sacrifice the earth and the fullness thereof.

Mr. Chairman, almost every day legislation is forced through Congress for almost everybody other than the farmer.

A few months past a mighty flood of water wrought devastation along the Mississippi River. There was loss of property and life on every hand. The Nation stood aghast, and with unanimity properly said, "This must not occur again." The great Mississippi flood lasted only a few weeks and devastated only a comparatively small area.

A mighty, onrushing, destructive flood of grossly unfair and discriminatory legislation has hurled its death-dealing and awful volume of murder and destruction against the property and very lives of all the farmers and their families of all the Nation, not for a few days but continuously, by day and by night, and since "the mind of man runneth not to the contrary."

By all just means Congress should solve, and at once, the great Mississippi flood-control problem. Transcendently more important, though, is the great problem of rescuing the farmer from the awful flood of unfair and discriminatory laws which engulf him and the placing of the farmer on an equality with other businesses and enterprises and above and safe from the seething flood which has so long beset him. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MORROW].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, one of the most important questions presented for the consideration of the people of this Nation during the past 25 years is the subject of flood control, or the disposition to be made of the surplus and destructive flood waters which take such a heavy toll of life each year and bring so much damage to property. The citizens who live in the channel of the flooded areas are impoverished, food supply is destroyed, and there is a huge loss of capital in the destruction of railroads, highways, bridges, and so forth.

Water, which is the most necessary element for both plant and animal life, has through man's folly become in our Nation one of the most destructive forces with which man has to contend.

In endeavoring to find a solution Congress and the Nation at large are confronted by two schools of thought. It is a serious proposition, whether or not we follow the one thought fostered by the engineers of the Government who for many years have been studying the problem. My opinion is that if they stick to the dike and levee system of flood control that a further mistake will be made, for the reason that nature's laws are continually being changed by man in the diversion of water to the river channels.

Timber once covered great portions of nearly every part of the Nation and successfully grew upon the banks of rivers and their smaller tributaries and headwaters; it covered the sides and slopes of our mountains and thus acted as a shade protection from the sun's rays; winter snows and summer rains were held in the earth until gradually released through tributary channels to rivers that flowed through and drained the agricultural areas.

These forests have been largely wiped out, and that great check provided by nature and nourished by nature's laws has been by man's avaricious disposition for wealth and personal selfishness largely destroyed.

The problem, then, before the Nation is to meet this condition by some method which will prevent flood disasters in the future.

In all these great problems man must look first to the provisions governing like problems in the early history of our Republic, before man started his wanton destruction. We must take into consideration existing conditions—the removal of our timber, the paving of our cities and towns, the hard surfacing of our roads, the numerous aqueducts and culverts for drainage, the reclamation of swamps, the uncontrolled flow of water from our mountain districts in the spring by the melting of the snow, the summer rains, and the washing down of the soil from our now unprotected areas.

The problem, then, is more than the mere construction of artificial dikes and levees to bottle up the surplus water. The lower part of the basin must in time fill up again with soil and débris; a problem follows in the same footsteps as that which preceded it; suffering, disaster, expenditures of more money and labor recur.

So many Americans pursue the law of expediency—people forgive and forget—and hardships and costs of Government are passed on to succeeding generations.

Many of our skilled and trained men fail to see any new thought or plan; they adhere to the plans fostered by their profession for years; they apparently feel that any change or deviation from their set principles would be a weakness and a confession that they had been wrong in the theory of flood control for a quarter of a century.

We have a great watershed in this country, drained by the Mississippi River, lying east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Alleghenies. Smaller streams drain into the Mississippi River channel and empty their waters into the same in increasing volumes annually. Not only water but soil carried from the area of some 31 States is emptied into this great river. The Mississippi in turn flows on with mud and water to the lower basin, where the mud is deposited at each succeeding flood, and the channel below is gradually filled so that the water must rise and seep through the soil and embankment in order to find an outlet. The natural law that water always seeks the lowest level is just as true upon the lower Mississippi as it is when the water flows into a basin in the earth until it fills up the basin and rises until an outlet is found by flowing through some strata to a lower level.

In order to restore natural law by the genius of man we must return to that principle that nature provided when this universe was prepared for man's habitation. This did not occur in one day, one year, or one century; it took countless thousands, aye millions, of years for the molten mass of which this earth is builded to gradually cool. The vapors cooling and sinking into the depressions formed our oceans, lakes, swamps, and so forth. Through further years of decay, decomposition, and deposit soil was formed; scientists tell us that it took 10,000 years to form 1 inch of soil. One dashing rain where there is no vegetation for protection can wipe away that inch of soil.

Then came upon this soil vegetation; next the simplest forms of animal life; later mammals, the animal that suckled its young. And lastly man, in his wild and primitive state, to develop and domesticate the animal species.

Man then had a paradise before him. Nature abounded in everything for his food, clothing, and well-being; every resource placed within his reach, and through his intelligence and inventive genius to be utilized by him. The resources included timber, wild life, water, minerals; in fact, everything that nature had deposited in the earth and permitted to grow on the surface.

The early pioneers who came to this country from Europe found a wilderness; forests filled with wild life, water fowl, fish, and all the products of nature, in fact. Lack of sense of utility caused much suffering among the early settlers. But soon new life and new supplies started the spirit of the pioneer to succeed in his new home for freedom.

He succeeded; he conquered much of the wilderness; his speculative and ingenious mind taught him not only to utilize but also to monopolize, and eventually to destroy much of that material so necessary for nature's law of correct regulation.

Man began to cut the timber from the river banks, from the area covering the watershed above, which permitted the timber to act as a reservoir and protection to the cultivated areas below. This has permitted a more rapid run-off, carrying in each rainfall tons of soil into the channels of the rivers. Soil and débris fill up the bays and outlets to a higher level and floods naturally occur during great and continual falls of moisture, which will always inundate lower stretches when the volume of water carried exceeds the capacity of the channel through which it is carried. This is what occurred in the flood of April, 1927.

This not only means the lower basin, but it can occur anywhere in the channel where the run-off is greater than the channel that carries the same. Mr. Speaker, this is the factor which caused flood destruction in Arkansas and Oklahoma, as well as in Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

Where does this moisture start and during what periods of the year does it occur? In the spring of the year, March and April, when the snows begin to melt in the mountain districts and vast quantities of moisture bring destruction somewhere in the stretches of the streams along its lower levels; again in the rainy months of July and August.

The flood problem has become a proposition to be dealt with as a national question and at national expense. Practically everyone is agreed upon this. The question is, how is the solution to be secured? In the makeshift solution heretofore made there have been so many errors that the Nation now demands a permanent and lasting solution. If wider channels are needed, the land should be purchased.

I noticed in the address of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], the day before yesterday, that he attributed the flood that created such destruction in his State between April 17 and April 20, 1927, mostly to a fall of rain during that period upon a watershed covered by the northern tributaries of the Arkansas River, the chief southwestern branch of the Mississippi.

He must not lose sight of the fact that at that time there were other branches turning their waters into the Arkansas from the Canadian or Red and Cimarron Rivers; these streams rise in the high mountains of my State and flow eastward into the Arkansas.

In order to get the thought to you, which was so well expressed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], that a system of strong reservoirs would control this flood situation, I want to impress upon you that in this great scheme of material development of the Nation we are turning the water into the channels during the flood period much more rapidly and in largely increasing volumes. There must be provided either a means of storage and diversion or a much greater channel than the streams afford now to carry the water to the Gulf of Mexico.

In my opinion storage dams will protect Oklahoma, which has an annual loss of millions of dollars from floods. This in turn would largely solve the question of floods in Arkansas. Storage dams in Nebraska and the Dakotas would largely solve the floods from the great Missouri River and each in turn would largely, if not entirely, solve the problem of the Mississippi River.

In a Nation that has lost by destruction more property in one great flood—the one of 1927—than it would cost to give the country almost absolute protection in the future by a well-thought-out and properly executed plan, it would appear to me that the highest duty of this Congress is to pass such legislation as will effectively solve this problem, and in so doing you must not overlook the impounding dam proposition.

It is estimated that the loss in Oklahoma alone in the year 1927 from flood damages was $20,000,000, and that State suffers a loss each year rising into the millions. This loss, it is stated by Government engineers, can be controlled by a system of detention dams in the headwaters from Gate, Okla., westward, and the means for such control should be by a system of detention dams located in the canyon formations of New Mexico and western Oklahoma.

The Bureau of Public Roads makes the report that the total land in the United States overflowed and in need of drainage is as follows: Area unfit, without flood control and drainage, 91,543,000 acres; and the total area needing flood control and drainage, 113,537,000 acres.

The area in Oklahoma overflowed and not fit for cultivation, without flood protection, is 650,000 acres; the total acreage requiring flood control is 952,000 acres. The impounding of water upon the upper sources of the rivers that overflow this area will reclaim this vast wealth. Estimate the great loss to the Nation of this vast territory through lack of flood control.

A system of flood control, then, should be broad enough to cover a plan which means success and the reclaiming of this useless land now destroyed by our uncontrolled waters.

Of course, there is no question but that the territory that received the greatest destruction both of property and life should receive the immediate and active attention of Congress. But the plan for flood control should meet the conditions in all sections of the Nation; Oklahoma and Arkansas, as well as Mississippi, Louisiana, and the other States in the basin of the great river.

A preliminary survey of the two streams rising in New Mexico was made in 1924, and report thereon was submitted by Donald H. Connolly, major, Corps of Engineers, district engineer of the United States. The report on the Cimarron River contains in part the following important information:

CIMARRON RIVER

It appears feasible to control floods by detention dams in the headwaters and benefit the valley for an indefinite distance downstream. Complete control can be obtained by detention dams along the streams from Gate, Okla., westward. The Cimarron River rises in the mountains of New Mexico and flows eastwardly to Oklahoma and across the southwest corner of Kansas into Oklahoma not far from Beaver, Okla. The watershed of the river is 470 miles long from east to west, with fairly uniform average width of about 40 miles.

The existing development affected by floods are bridges, tracks, and highways. The river is crossed by 17 railroad lines, one of which is in New Mexico, 2 in Kansas, and 14 in Oklahoma; bridges are expensive to build and have been repeatedly lost at several localities in Oklahoma. The last destructive flood was in June, 1923. Many bridges were washed out. One railroad in Oklahoma suffered a loss in the washout of tracks and bridges of $1,000,000 in 1923.

The worst flood was on August 26, 1908; the town of Folsom, N. Mex., where the fall is said to be 40 or 50 feet per mile, was washed away and 17 people drowned.

CANADIAN RIVER

The Canadian River is a tributary of the Arkansas River. It rises in the Cimarron Mountains of New Mexico near the Colorado-New Mexico State line and flows in a southerly direction to San Miguel County, N. Mex., then in an easterly direction through New Mexico, Texas, and Oklahoma, to its termination in the Arkansas River 27 miles below Muskogee, Okla. The total length of the river is 833 miles, and it drains an area 560 miles long from east to west, comprising about 46,140 square miles.

Existing development affected by floods are engineering works, bridges, industrial plants, etc. The main damage by floods has been to railroad bridges and tracks, highway bridges, farm lands, and crops. Of the 21 railroad crossings, 4 are in New Mexico, 2 in Texas, and 15 in Oklahoma. The land is subject to frequent overflow. It is believed that the combined capacity of the reservoir available at sites outlined will be sufficient to retain the run-off from the greatest storms that have occurred. If not, other suitable sites may be found where, on account of the short span, the cost of construction would not be excessive.

The impounding dams, if built, would largely protect Oklahoma and in turn assist in the protection of Arkansas. The statement made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] shows that the Arkansas and White Rivers in the recent flood showed a discharge of 60 per cent of the rise shown in the Mississippi River, or a per second-foot flow of 1,200,000 feet, while the flow of the Mississippi below the mouth of the Arkansas was shown to be 2,000,000 second-feet.

This would indicate clearly that the Arkansas and its tributaries, if 33⅓ per cent of the flood waters was controlled, would largely solve the floods upon the lower Mississippi.

I have cited the engineer's report to you upon protection in Oklahoma. The same principle can be applied to Kansas, eastern Colorado, Nebraska, and upon the Missouri and its tributaries.

To illustrate what impounding dams mean for the protection of the flooded area of the Mississippi River, I call your attention to the Elephant Butte Dam upon the Rio Grande River, N. Mex. This is an example of what protection a dam can be to the lower land and cities from the floods of the river. This dam impounds the largest body of fresh water in the world used for irrigation and flood protection. Under it are some 186,000 acres of cultivated land in the United States, and some 40,000 acres in the Republic of Mexico. El Paso, Tex., a city of 110,000 people, is protected from floods, as is also Juarez, Mexico, a city of 40,000 people. The people upon this river below the dam are protected from floods, the water is applied beneficially, and the Government is being repaid for its expenditure of $14,500,000. I agree, of course, with the gentleman from Arkansas, and with the other western Members, that while impounding dams may not entirely solve the problem of flood control, they go a long way toward a correct solution of the same.

Impounding dams built on the tributaries above will in a great measure control the floods upon the Mississippi River and permit the water to be applied beneficially. There is an argument that these dams can not be used when needed for water storage. The fact is the head gates can at most times of the year, and especially during the flow of the streams, be thrown open so that the water can be diverted to the land. Only at certain crop stages need the water be kept from the land. Then, too, the reclaiming of land in changing it from arid prairie to cultivation makes a change in the soil's absorption of water from 10 per cent under arid conditions to 90 per cent under cultivation.

In the scheme for flood control, I repeat, the question of impounding dams and the future benefit for the use of this water must be properly considered. The plan must be worked out so that all flood-affected parts of the country may receive due treatment, Oklahoma and Arkansas in like manner to other States within the basin of the flood destruction.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I wish to call attention to some general observations made yesterday by my good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], which evinced such lack of information as to the accomplishments of the American Navy and its efficient officer personnel that I feel it is but simple justice that I give some recent instances of outstanding service rendered by our Navy in time of peace and some of the benefits that have accrued to the Nation from the inventive genius of its officer personnel.

The activities of the United States Navy are not entirely centered upon the preparations for war. In the construction and operation of the modern fleet the manifold responsibilities of organization and training have brought about a new order of things, which brings to light a side of the Navy little known to the Nation at large. For in the training of the Navy in time of peace we find in concentrated form the very essence of service to the Nation whenever an emergency arises. While we think only of the Navy as a fleet of war vessels in constant preparation for battle, seldom is it heard that the Navy, through its educational system, whereby untrained men from all parts of the country are instructed so that they may take their places and man the many posts of duty on board our battleships, are returning to the Nation every year from 8,000 to 10,000 well-trained citizens, eager and trained to take up the duties of citizens which confront them upon their return from their voluntary naval service.

And then, too, it is inevitable that the three hundred and odd vessels of the Navy in the Atlantic, Pacific, Asiatic, European, and Central American waters may often act on missions of mercy and give succor not only to our nationals but also to the citizens of many lands and many climes in times of stress and peril. It is happy for this country that the vessels of our Navy, flying the flag of our country, may extend our national hand of friendship and good feeling in dire times. What could better express our feelings of international good will than to have our well-trained war vessels proceed on errands of mercy to render timely, efficient, and systematic aid to those in trouble?

EARTHQUAKE IN JAPAN

When the whole world was shocked by the horror of the disaster in Japan in 1923, the vessels of the American fleet, under the command of Admiral E. A. Anderson, were placed at the disposal of the Japanese authorities. The work done by our Navy for humanity justified its existence in that instance just as brilliantly in time of peace as though it had won a glorious victory in a naval encounter. The American destroyers sent immediately to Yokohama with medical supplies and assistance to relieve the stricken Japanese people were the first foreign naval vessels to arrive. By direction of the President, the commander in chief of the fleet was authorized to purchase supplies necessary for relief. Naval medical officers treated hundreds of sufferers, while naval vessels were continuously used in the transportation of American citizens and foreigners alike to places of refuge. Throughout weeks of constant effort the services of the officers and men of the Navy never lagged. The result was that when its mission of relief was accomplished the vessels of the fleet took their departure from Japanese waters, and they carried with them the warmest gratitude of the people of Japan and the thousands of Americans and foreigners whom they had aided in the greatest disaster of modern times, leaving behind them, as the American ambassador said, "A glow of admiration and gratitude that will live for years to come."

EARTHQUAKE TIDAL WAVE IN CHILE

It has been the happy circumstance of our Navy to carry relief to many quarters of the globe. When earthquake and tidal wave swept the coast of Chile in November, 1922, vessels carrying the Stars and Stripes were among the first to carry assistance to the stricken area. Trained in the preparation of war, they hurried on their mission of peace with medical stores, provisions, and clothing, to render assistance to the needy, assisting in bringing relief to hundreds whose homes had been destroyed, and who lacked food and clothing.

REFUGEES—MEDITERRANEAN, ÆGEAN, BLACK SEAS

Turning our attention for a moment to the waters of the Mediterranean, Black, and Ægean Seas, we find our sturdy destroyers rendering assistance at the Smyrna fire in September, 1922, under the direction of our own Admiral Bristol. Hundreds of refugees were evacuated to places of safety. On one destroyer alone 670 women, children, and old men were brought on board, or rescued after they had sought escape from the flames of the burning city by jumping into the water, or being thrown into the water from overloaded and sinking boats. Under the control of Admiral Bristol a total of 262,000 Greek and Armenian nationals were carried out of the stricken areas to places of safety. Here our men, trained to the complexities of routine on our war vessels, carried on the humane work of saving lives with an untiring cheerfulness and efficiency, which reflected credit on the American manhood our clean-cut bluejackets typified.

COMMANDER ATLEE EDWARDS—SEA OF MARMORA

Every American citizen must be thrilled by the courageous act of the late Commander Atlee Edwards in the Sea of Marmora in December, 1923, when with his destroyer, the U. S. S. Bainbridge, he and his gallant crew effected the rescue of 482 of the officers, crew, and passengers of the burning French transport Vinh-Long.

Twice blown from the side of the burning transport by the force of explosions on board, and under fire from a barrage of exploding ammunition and débris, the splendid Americans clung to their task, and as a desperate solution of the problem rammed the transport and rescued the panic-stricken passengers while the bow of the destroyer was wedged into the side of the doomed vessel. For this courageous exploit the late Commander Edwards was fittingly awarded the congressional medal of honor.

HURRICANE—ISLE OF PINES

Again the scene shifts, this time to the near-by Caribbean, where the tiny Isle of Pines was laid desolate by a hurricane in October, 1926. Due to the dispatch with which the Navy vessels ordered to the scene rendered aid, suffering in the stricken area was minimized.

MIAMI HURRICANE

Only a month previously in our own State of Florida the city of Miami had been laid waste by a similar hurricane. Again the Navy came to the scene of the catastrophe to bear its full share of the brunt in furnishing medical supplies and personnel, as well as assisting in patrol and rescue work. Time and again we find the annals of the Navy reflecting the highest credit in the work of mercy. The Navy is able to carry on this work efficiently, expeditiously, and with such honor to the country because of the fact that its organization to act as the bulwark of the Nation's defense in time of war likewise permits its happier use in time of stress and need in time of peace.

GUAM, SAMOA, VIRGIN ISLANDS

Some of our overseas possessions we find governed by naval rule. In the far-away Pacific we note the islands of American Samoa and Guam governed by naval personnel. This Government is a peaceful one. The duties of our American naval personnel are largely concerned with the education and the sanitation of the native population. A visit to the islands will show the most skeptical observers the respect and admiration which our intelligent supervision over the native has brought forth. Far removed from the art of warfare on the high seas, yet these public servants wearing the uniform of our Navy have done much to alleviate suffering and promote contentment. In the Virgin Islands of the West Indies we find that the same situation maintains. Helpful to a high degree, and true to its trust, the American Navy carries on at whatever task it is assigned to do, however obscure it may be.

MISSISSIPPI FLOOD

In April of 1927 the country was staggered by the fury of the Mississippi River. Relief work was necessary. Transportation was paralyzed. It was essential that surveys be made of the stricken area in order that the work of saving the refugees and maintaining them in positions of safety be carefully supervised. Time was a big element. The facilities of our naval air station at Pensacola, Fla., were immediately made available and as many as 32 planes were engaged in the relief work at one time. The personnel operated under unfavorable and at times hazardous conditions and performed their duties to the great benefit of the victims of the flood. Operating over the swollen waters, the planes constantly patrolled the newly flooded regions as the crest swept to the southward. This patrol located large numbers of people imprisoned by the flood waters, and furnished information for directing the movements of the flotillas of boats engaged in the rescue work. It has been stated that after the prompt establishment of this patrol, the loss of life from flood waters was reduced to some three or four individuals; and it was also estimated that had this patrol not been effective thousands of lives would have been lost.

This aerial force expedited transportation and speeded up the effective administration of flood relief. However, conditions became so bad that communication systems became paralyzed. Therefore the Navy and Marine Corps organized and established 19 radio stations on shore and on relief vessels to aid in the rescue of personnel and to assist in the maintenance of the levee integrity.

Cooperating with the Red Cross officials and Government and State officials of the States in the flood area this typical Navy relief activity, efficient in operation, carried on in another incident of peace time, life-saving activity.

SEARCH FOR MISSING AIRPLANES

Whether it be a search for missing airplanes, such as the Navy carried out in August of 1927 for the missing aviators participating in the Dole Hawaiian flight, when 54 vessels covered 350,000 square miles by steaming 152,000 miles, while their planes flew 9,000 miles, or whether the search be for the missing airplane Dawn, when destroyers and the lighter-than-air Los Angeles searched in freezing weather from New York to Newfoundland, the problem, no matter how unexpectedly it is presented, is undertaken instantly because from the very nature of its service our Navy strives for preparation and is prepared to fulfill its obligation to the Nation.

It may be that the peace-time pursuit of the Navy takes shape in advancing the science of aviation. A plane manned by naval aviators was the first to fly across the Atlantic Ocean. In a flight from Trepassey Bay, Newfoundland, to Lisbon, Portugal, via the Azore Islands, the NC–4, commanded by Commander Albert C. Read, brought true the dream of aviators. This flight was a flight planned by our Navy as a scientific undertaking to demonstrate the possibilities of aerial navigation and to work out in practice the untried problems of overseas flight.

AIR-COOLED AVIATION ENGINE

The development of the air-cooled aviation engine was a problem undertaken by the United States Navy, and at the recent presentation of the Collier trophy to Mr. Lawrence, the designer of the Wright engine, for his noteworthy work in the advance of aviation he paid full tribute to the cooperation afforded him and the help made possible by the assistance of the Navy's engineering experts.

AERIAL SURVEY SOUTHEASTERN ALASKA

An expedition organized by the Navy Department undertook in 1926 an aerial survey of southeastern Alaska at the request of the Department of the Interior. Despite the virgin territory over which the amphibian planes had to fly in the course of their photographic work, when the failure of an engine meant disaster and almost certain death, the personnel were able to report that they had accomplished in a single summer 75 per cent of the work tentatively scheduled for a period of three years. New lakes were discovered upon which the eye of man had undoubtedly never gazed before. Vast stretches of forest and mountains were accurately mapped for the first time. It was made possible through the effective use of the aviation branch of our Navy.

SANTA BARBARA EARTHQUAKE

There are many other instances of the Navy's never-ceasing work of peace-time advance, of merciful rescue, and assistance, even if one would but pursue the activities of our vessels scattered throughout the globe over a period of a few years. One can recall the assistance rendered when an earthquake wrought havoc in the California city of Santa Barbara in 1925. We read of the officials of our Naval Observatory journeying to far-away Sumatra to record and analyze an eclipse of the sun in January, 1926. Our pride in the Navy is increased when we read the appreciation of the vice president of the Eastern Steamship Line, when he thanked naval officials for the prompt assistance rendered to the steamer Robert E. Lee when she stranded on the Mary Ann Rocks a fortnight ago. One paragraph of his letter of appreciation, it seems to me, makes plain the point which I have been trying to make concerning the activities of the United States Navy:

It seems to us—

Reads the letter—

that if the people of this country could understand the services rendered by the United States Navy in peace time that they would better appreciate its necessity and its being maintained at the highest state of efficiency. This is not the first time we have had experience in assistance from the United States Navy, and at all times they have responded promptly and rendered the most valuable and efficient service.

RESCUE ITALIAN AVIATOR

Vessels of our fleet in Asiatic waters were able to materially assist the Army in their successful accomplishment of the first successful around-the-world flight in 1924, while the light cruiser Richmond, with Rear Admiral Magruder, was able to effect the rescue of the Italian aviator, Locatelli, after he had been missing over 60 hours in the North Atlantic.

RADIO-COMPASS DEVELOPMENT

Almost unheard of is the all-important and ever-increasing efficiency of the radio-compass stations of the Navy, which are proving so effective in increasing the safety of navigation of ships in coastal waters during fogs and heavy weather. A recent analysis showed that during one month these shore stations had furnished the needed bearings to over 9,000 naval and merchant ships, the bearings being furnished at an average time of less than three minutes and with an average area computed by the vessels receiving the bearing at less than one degree. So it can be seen that in this great work, just as in the development of other lines of activity, the trend is not to await the inevitable emergencies where relief and assistance are so badly needed and to confine the peace-time effort solely to these meritorious efforts of mercy, but in a larger degree we find the efforts of the Navy in peace time tending more and more to a realization of the good which can be accomplished through the continued development along scientific, educational, sanitary, and other helpful lines which store up in the reservoir of our Navy potential energy which reflects the greatest of credit upon the whole Nation, due to the patriotic service of the officers and men of our Navy, and which in these continued days of peace show increasingly the good to be derived from, rather than the detriment, of our armed force upon the sea.

Not only did the gentleman from New York overlook the great humanitarian service so often rendered by our Navy, some of which I have called to your mind, but he made the startling statement that the Navy throughout its long and honored history had shown little, if any, inventive genius. I took occasion, after hearing this statement, to request Admiral Hughes, Chief of Naval Operations, to furnish me with a partial list of inventions by naval officers, and I think the gentleman from New York will revise and correct his remarks when he reads this partial list of what they have contributed to our Nation and its Navy. [Applause.]

Under leave to extend, I insert the letter from Admiral Hughes, and invite the Members of the House to read the interesting data it contains:

The above list gives improvements for which patents have been specifically granted. In a large number of instances improvements made by naval personnel are never patented. Under the direction of the bureaus concerned improvements are constantly being made.

Some of the present-day developments are included in the following:

Admiral Dyson, United States Navy, is an outstanding figure in connection with the development of screw propulsion. His work in propeller design is known throughout the world. Admiral Dyson also owns patents on water-tube boilers, patents on evaporators, patents on the combination of burning coal in combination with oil and the burning of powdered coal; improvements in reciprocating engines.

Capt. S. M. Robinson, United States Navy, and others, under the Bureau of Engineering, are responsible for many of the most important developments in connection with electric propulsion, including the control which makes its application for the propulsion of ships practicable. Captain Robinson's especially original work was in connection with the backing and turning of ships.

Commander J. S. Evans, United States Navy, rendered great assistance in his investigation of the use of pulverized fuel for marine purposes.

Other officers attached to the Naval Engineering Experiment Station have contributed materially in this direction. Some of the specific things developed by naval officers attached to the Bureau of Engineering are:

Development of the burning of fuel oil in marine boilers carried out in conjunction with the fuel-oil test plan, Philadelphia, Pa.

Development of the low-pressure submerged tube type of evaporator.

Development of the fire-control and interior-communication instruments and systems for shipboard use.

Development of leaflet specifications for materials which, in the majority of cases, has formed the basis of Federal specifications for purchase of material for all departments of the Government.

By model tank tests has served to reduce the effective horsepower required for propulsion.

Development of the use of material, such as turbine blading, and the use of aluminum.

The development of a satisfactory type of electric cables for shipboard installations.

Forced the development of a high standard for steel by development of specifications.

Development of the water-tube boiler for marine purposes.

Development of the use of reduction gears for propulsion.

The writing of the general specifications for machinery which now furnishes a basis for writing the specifications in connection with shipbuilding for commercial use.

Writing of the bureau manual which now forms the basis of a study in engineering in a large number of colleges and universities.

Some further outstanding accomplishments by naval personnel which have never been patented are the center line turret installation in vertical echelon by Capt. D. W. Taylor, United States Navy; and a design and development of a model tank for research work in the design of the underwater body of ships by Captain Taylor. This work was undertaken primarily to improve the underwater body of naval ships, but has been used most extensively for merchant-ship construction.
